ARMIMD AND WHITESTONE.

The competition between the 15th and Field Divisions in the Union was severe. The 15th Division had already shown its mettle in the battles of Antietam and Chancellorsville, while the Field Division had distinguished itself in the campaigns of the Peninsula and Gettysburg. The two sides faced each other in a line of trenches, each side determined to hold its position at all costs. The intensity of the combat was such that even the hardest veterans shivered in their boots. The death toll was high, with both sides losing a significant number of men. The battle raged on for hours, with neither side able to gain an advantage. It was a grim and bloody affair, but in the end, the 15th Division emerged victorious, securing a significant victory for the Union forces.
