Diary in Libby Prison.

[March 1868]

month prove embarrassing enough. Though the windows had been provided with iron bars, orders were now given forbidding us to look out; and the guards, according to orders, which they rather like to obey, will fire at you when you least expect it. The other day, one of the prisoners standing in the sink, and not at all intending to look out, had his ear grazed by a bullet. As a precautionary measure the sinks are being built inside the rooms, an operation the effects of which will soon enough be felt in the crowded prison. Ticklish thinks this is operating on ['interior lines.']

To-day, March 12th, the well-informed pretend that another boat is up with lots of rebel prisoners: whose turn will be the next? Major Turner, the commander of the prison, told me the other day, when the first batch left, that he had forgotten my name. I asked him not to do so in future. Therefore let me hope; let me hope quietly, with only gentle illusions of success. Our exchange, says humorous E., is only a question of time; and so is the end of human life, think I to myself.

Here my Libby notes end. Before forty-eight hours had passed, I was actually out of Libby, steaming down to City Point.

A fresh batch of rebel prisoners had arrived at City Point on the 13th of March, for which an equivalent number of Union prisoners was to be sent back, including a certain number of officers. Next day the prison was all excitement, many expecting to be among the chosen ones. I, feeling rather indisposed that morning, had just refused an invitation of General Scammon to a game of chess, when the inspector of the prison came up to read the list of the officers declared paroled.

I listened to the reading of the names with a sort of involuntary slouched restlessness, and when it came to the captains and I heard my name, I felt completely overpowered. We had hardly two minutes to prepare for our departure; and weak as I was, my agitation gave me strength enough to help General Neal Dow to carry down his trunk. We were some thirty-four officers thus released and carried down the James on board the small Confederate steamer Schults; some four hundred enlisted men followed us in another vessel. It was already dark when we reached City Point, where the U.S. steamer New York, laden with rebel prisoners, lay anchored. They hailed the Confederate flag with a lusty yell; ours were too much prostrated to utter a sound at the sight of the Stars and Stripes. After a brief conversation between the two agents of exchange, Judge Ould and Major Mulford, the prisoners changed places. To us the change was actually bewildering, as we entered the saloon of the U.S. steamer, elegantly lighted, and with the long table neatly covered. We jumped about like so many idiots, asking each other, Is it true? Is it really so? The head waiter announced that he had only coffee and bread and ham to give us. This 'only' elicited a broad shout of merriment. For a few of us a special treat was in reserve. We were invited to spend the evening in the company of the commander of the ship, Captain Chiholm, and his wife. I shall not try to describe how we felt in this hospitable small family circle that night, and what feelings we lay down to rest. The next day brought us to Camp Parole, Annapolis.

FRASER'S MAGAZINE.

APRIL 1868.

VIKRAM AND THE VAMPIRE; OR, TALES OF INDIAN DEVILRY.

ADAPTED BY

RICHARD F. BURTON,
Vice-President, Anthropological Society, London.

One who had eyes saw it; the blind will not understand it.
A poet, who is a boy, he has perceived it: he who understands it, will be his sire's sire.

I.

Prologue.

'The genius of Eastern nations,' says an established and respectable authority, 'was, from the earliest times, much turned towards invention and the love of fiction. The Indians, the Persians, and the Arabsians, were all famous for their fables. Amongst the ancient Greeks we hear of the Ionian and Milesian tales, but they have now perished, and, from every account that we hear of them, appear to have been loose and indecent.'

Similarly, the classical dictionaries define 'Milesius Fabulae' to be 'licentious themes,' or 'ludicrous and indecent plays.'

My friend, Mr. Richard Charnock, says of Milesian fables, that they were originally 'certain tales or novels composed by Aristides of Miletus;' gay in matter and graceful in manner. They were translated into Latin by the historian Sisenna, the friend of Atticus, and they had great success at Rome. Plutarch (Life of Caius) says that after the defeat of Carthage, some Milesians were found in the baggage of the Roman prisoners. The Greek text and the Latin translation have long been lost. The only surviving fable is that of Psyche, which Apuleius, the learned African who wrote in the fourth century of our era calls 'Milesius sermo,' and it makes us deeply regret the disappearance of the others. Besides this there are the remains of Apollodorus and Conon, and a few traces to be found in Pausanias, Athenæus, and the scholiasts.

\[1\] Metamorphosis, seu de Astrae Auro, libri xi. The well-known and beautiful episode is in the fourth, the fifth, and the sixth books.

I do not agree with Blair and the dictionaries. Milletus, the great maritime city of Asia Minor, was of old, the meeting-place of the Baltic and the West. Here the Phoenician trade from the Baltic would meet the Hindu wandering from Extra Gangem, and the Hyperborean would step on shore by side with the Nubian and the Ethiop. There was produced and published for the use of the then civilized world, the genuine Oriental apologue, myth and tale combined, which by amusing narrative and romantic adventure, inculcates a lesson in morals or in humanity, of which we often in our days must fail to perceive the drift. As regards their licentiousness, this sign of semi-civilization is still inherent in most Eastern books of the description which we call 'light literature,' and the ancestral tale-teller never collects a larger purse than when he relates the worst. But this looseness is accidental, not necessary. The following collection will show that it can be dispensed with, and that there is such a thing as comparative purity in Hindu literature. The author, indeed, almost always takes the trouble to marry his hero and his heroine, and if he cannot find a priest, he generally adopts an exceedingly left hand and Caledonian but legal rite called 'gambarbhis.'

The work of Apuleius, for instance, as ample internal evidence shows, is borrowed from the East. The groundwork of the tale is the metamorphosis of Lucius of Corinth into an ass, and the strange adventures which precede his recovering the human form.

An old Hindu story-book called

1 The book of Apuleius before quoted is subject to as many discoveries of recondite meaning as Rablais.

2 This ceremony will be explained in a future page.

1868] Tales of Indian Devity.

such a bridegroom is truly wonderful.

Other Brahmins then present said:

O king, at the marriage hour, in sign of joy the sacred shell is blown, but thou hast no need of that (alluding to the donkey's braying).

The women all cried out:

O my mother! what is this at the time of marriage to have an ass! What a monstrous thing! What will he give that angelic girl in marriage to a donkey?

At length Gandharbasena, addressing the king in Sanskrit, urged him to perform his promise. He reminded his future father-in-law that there is no act more meritorious than speaking truth; that the body is merely like dress, and that wise men never estimate the value of a person by the clothes which he wears. He added that he was in that shape from the curse of his sire, and that during the night he had the body of a man. Of his being the son of Indra there could be no doubt.

Hearing the donkey thus speak Sanskrit, the minds of the people were changed, and they confessed that, although he had an assine form, he was unquestionably the son of Indra, for it was never known that an ass could speak Sanskrit. The king, therefore, gave him his daughter in marriage. The metamorphosis brings with it many misfortunes and more adventures, and it lasts till Fate in the author's hand restores the hero to his former shape and honours.

Gandharbasena is a quasi-historical personage who lived in the century preceding the Christian era. The story had, therefore, ample time to reach the ears of Apuleius (born A.D. 150).

The Baital-Pachisi, or Twenty-five (tales of a) Baital—"a vampire or evil spirit which animates dead bodies—is an old and thoroughly Hindu story. It is the beginning of that fictitious history which ripened to the Arabian Nights Entertainments, and which, fostered by the genius of Boccaccio, produced the romance of the chivalrous days, and its last development, the novel—that prosaic of modern Europe.

Composed in Sanskrit, the language of the gods, alias the Latin of India, it has been translated into all the Prakrit and vernacular and modern dialects of the great peninsula. The reason why it has not found favour with the Moslems is doubtless the highly polytheistic spirit which pervades it; moreover, the Faithful had already a specimen of that style of composition. This was the Hitopadesa, or Advice of a Friend, which, as a line in its introduction informs us, was borrowed from an older book, the Pancatantra, or Five Chapters. It is a collection of apocryphal stories collected by a learned Brahman, Vishnu Sharma by name, for the edification of his pupils, the sons of an Indian Raja. They have been adapted to or translated into a number of languages, notably into Persian, Syriac and Turkish, Greek and Latin, Hebrew and Arabic. And as the Fables of Pilpay, they are generally known, at least by name, to Europe. Voltaire remarks, 'Quand on fait reflexion que presque toute la terre a été infatvue de pavillons, et qu'ils ont fait l'éducation du genre humain, on trouve les fables de...”
The circumstances of his accession to the throne, as will presently appear, are differently told. Once, however, made King of Malaya, the modern Malwa, a province of Western Upper India, he so distinguished himself that the Hindū fabulists, with their usual exaggeration, have made him 'bring the whole earth under the shadow of one umbrella.'

The last ruler of the race of Maydrā, which reigned 318 years, was Rāja-pāl. He reigned 25 years, but giving himself up to effeminacy, his country was invaded by Shākāditya, a king from the highlands of Kumaon. Vikramaditya, in the fourteenth year of his reign, pretended to espouse the cause of Rājapāl, attacked and destroyed Shākāditya, and ascended the throne of Delhi. His capital was Avanti, or Ujjaivani, the modern Ujjain. It was 13 kos (26 miles) long by 18 miles wide. He obtained the title of Shakārī, 'foe of the Shakers' (Sace, Sействians), by his victories over that redoubtable race.

In the Kali Yuga, or Iron Age, Vikram stands highest amongst the Hindu kings as the patron of learning. Nine persons under his patronage, popularly known as the nine gems of science, hold in India the honourable position of the seven wise men of Greece. These learned persons wrote works in the eighteen original languages from which, say the Hindus, all the languages of the earth have been derived. Dhanvantari enlightened the world upon the subjects of medicine and incantations. Kakapanaka treated the primary elements. Amara-Singha compiled a Sanskrit dictionary and a philosophical treatise. Shankubetābhata composed comments and

---

1 Vikram = ‘valor’ or ‘prowess.’
2 More is possible to quote the names of more than nine out of the eighteen, namely: Sanskrit, Prakrit, Naga, Paisheka, Gandharva, Rākshasa, Ardhhamāgadda, Ape, and Gahurya—most of them being the languages of different orders of fabulous beings. He tells us, however, that an account of these dialects may be found in the work called Pinapāla.
3 It is not pretended that the words of these Hindu tales are preserved to the letter. The question about the metamorphosis of cats into tigers, for instance, proceeded from a Gem of Learning in a university much nearer home than Gaur. Similarly the learned Mgr. Gaume (Traité du Saint-Esprit, p. 81) joins Camerarius in the belief that serpents prefer to bite women rather than men. And he quotes (p. 192) Cornelius a Lapide, who informs us that the leopard is the produce of a lioness with a hyena or a pard.

The merit of the old stories lies in their suggestiveness and their general applicability. I have ventured to remedy the coarseness of their language, and to clothe the skeleton with flesh and blood.

---

1 Translated by Sir Wm. Jones, 1789; and Professor Williams, 1836.
2 Translated by Professor H. H. Wilson.
3 The time was propitious to savants. Whilst Vikramaditya lived, Māgha, another king, caused to be written a poem called after his name. For each verse he is said to have paid to learned men a gold piece, which amounted to a total of 5,256. It was a large sum in those days. About the same period, 1899, was famed for patronising the learned men who rose to honour at Vikram’s court. Bhavaka, a poet of the nearly same age, received from King Shhṛhasena the magnificent present of 16,000 for a poem called the Rattus-Mald.
4 Lett. Wiltford supports the theory that there were eight Vikramadityas, the last of whom established the era. For further particulars, the curious reader will consult Lassen’s Anthologius, and Professor H. H. Wilson’s Essay on Vikram, (New As. Res. ii. 117).
Vikram and the Vampire; or, Tales of Indian Devity.

Vikram was the second son of an old king Gandharba-Sena, concerning whom little favourable has reached posterity, except that he became an ass, married four queens, and had by them six sons, each of whom was more learned and powerful than the other. It so happened that in course of time the father died, leaving the eldest heir, who was named Shank, succeeded to the carpet of Rajas, and was instantly murdered by Vikram his younger brother, the hero of the following pages.1

1 History tells us another tale. The god Indra and the King of Dhara gave the kingdom to Bhartari-hari, another son ofDhara-Sena, by a handmaid. For some time, the brothers lived together, but presently they quarrelled. Vikram being displeased from court, wandered from place to place in abject poverty, and at one time hired himself as a servant to the merchant living in Ganges. The world on account of the infidelity of his wife, to whom he was ardently attached, became a religious devotee, and left the kingdom to its fate. In the course of his travels, Vikram once to Ujjayini, and finding it without a head, assumed a shape wherewith he was reconciled with great splendour, conquering by his arms Utka, Vanga, Kuch-kebar, Gujarat, Sommat, Delhi, and other places; until, in his turn, he was conquered and slain by Shitilvahan.

2 The words are found, says Mr. Ward, in the Hindu History compiled by Mrityungya.

The steps which he took to arrive at that pinnacle of grandeur were these.

King Dhara, says the historian, calling his two grandsons Bhartari-hari and Vikram, gave them good counsel respecting their future learning. They were told to master everything, a certain way not to succeed in anything. They were diligently to learn grammar, the scriptures, all the religions sciences. They were to master military tactics, international law and music, the riding of horses and elephants—especially the latter—the driving of chariots, and the use of the broadsword, the bow, and the mordara or Indian clubs. They were ordered to be skillful in all kinds of games, in leaping and running, in besieging forts, in forming and breaking bodies of troops; they were to excel in every princely quality, to learn to ascertain the power of an enemy, how to make war, to perform journeys, to sit in the presence of the nobles, to separate the different sides of a question, to form alliances, to distinguish between the innocent and the guilty, to assign proper punishments to the wicked, to exercise authority with perfect justice, and to be liberal. The boys were then sent to school, and were placed under the care of excellent teachers, where they became truly famous. Whilst under pupilage, the eldest was invested with the power necessary to obtain a knowledge of royal affairs, and he was not invested with the regal office till in these preparatory steps he had given full satisfaction to his subjects, who expressed high approbation of his conduct.

The two brothers often conversed on the duties of kings, when the great Vikramaditya gave Bhartari-hari the following valuable advice: 1

As Indra, during the four rainy months, fills the earth with water, so a king should fill his treasury with money. As Surya, the sun, in warming the earth eight months, does not scour it, so a king in drawing revenues from his people, ought not to oppress them. As Vayu, the wind, surrounds and fills everything, so the king by his officers and spies should become acquainted with the affairs and circumstances of his people. As Yama judges men without partiality or prejudice, and punishes all the guilty, so should a king punish, without favour, all offenders. As Varuna, the regent of water, binds with his pista or divine noose his enemies, so let a king bind all malefactors safely in prison. As Chandra, the moon, by his cheerful light gives pleasure to all, so should a king by gifts and generosity, make all his people happy. And as Prithwi, the earth, sustains all alike, so should a king feel an equal affection and forbearance towards all.

Became a monarch, Vikram mediated deeply upon what is said of monarchs:—A king is fire and air; he is both sun and moon; he is the god of criminal justice; he is the genius of wealth; he is the regent of water; he is the lord of the firmament; he is a powerful agent who appears in human shape. He reflected with some satisfaction that the scriptures had made him absolute, had left the lives and properties of all his subjects to his arbitrary will, had pronounced him to be an imperious deity, and threatened to punish with death even ideas derogatory to his honour.

He punctually observed all the ordinances laid down by the author of the Niti, or institutes of government. His nights and days were divided into sixteen pahars or portions, each one hour and a half, and they were disposed of as follows:

Day—Before dawn Vikram was awakened by a servant appointed to this special duty. He swallowed —a thing allowed only to a kshatriya or warrior—a Mithridatic every morning on the saliva, 2 and he made the cooks taste every dish before he ate of it. As soon as he had risen, the pages in waiting repeated his splendid qualities, and as he left his sleeping-room in full dress, several Brahmans rehearsed the praises of the gods. Presently he bathed, worshipped his guardian deity, again heard hymns, drank a little water, and saw alms distributed to the poor. He ended this watch by auditing his accounts.

Next, entering his court, he placed himself amidst the assembly. He was always armed when he received strangers, and he caused even women to be searched for concealed weapons. He was surrounded by so many spies and so artful that of a thousand, no two ever told the same tale. At the levee of the night sat his relations, the Brahmans, and men of distinguished birth. The other castes were on the left, and close to him stood the ministers and those whom he delighted to consult. After in front gathered the bard chanting the praises of the gods and of the king; also the charioteers, elephants, horsemen, and soldiers of valor. Amongst the

---

1 These duties of kings are thus laid down in the Rejtarangini.
2 Lamps, not Lams.
3 That is to say, 'upon an empty stomach.'
learned men in those assemblies there were ever some who were well instructed in all the scriptures, and others who had studied in one particular school of philosophy, and were acquainted only with the works on divine wisdom, or with those on justice, civil and criminal, on the arts, mineralogy or the practice of physics; also persons cunning in all kinds of customs; riding masters, dancing masters, teachers of good behaviour, examiners, tasters, mimics, mountebanks, and others, who all attended the court and awaited the king's commands. He here pronounced judgment in suits of appeal.

Before the second sandhya, or noon, about the beginning of the third watch, he recited the names of the gods, bathed, and broke his fast in his private room; after rising he was amused by singers and dancing girls. The labours of the day now became lighter. After eating he retired, repeating the name of his guardian deity, visited the temples, saluted the gods, conversed with the priests, and proceeded to receive and to distribute presents. Fitfully, he discussed political questions with his ministers and counsellors.

On the announcement of the herald that it was the sixth watch—about 2 or 3 p.m.—Vikram allowed himself to follow his own inclinations, to regulate his family, and transact business of a private and personal nature. His poets wrote about him:

The lord of lustre shone an instant suscends His course at mid-morn, ere he westward ascends;
And brief are the moments our young monarch knows Devoted to pleasure or paid to repose!

After gaining strength by rest, he proceeded to review his troops, examining the men and saluting the officers, and holding military councils. At sunset he bathed a third time and performed the five sacraments of listening to a precept of the Vedas; making oblations to the deities; sacrificing to Fire in honour of the deities; giving rice to dumb creatures; and receiving guests with due ceremonials. He spent the evening amidst a select company of wise, learned and pious men, conversing on different subjects and reviewing the business of the day.

The night was distributed with equal care. During the first portion Vikram received the reports which his spies and envoys, dressed in every disguise, brought to him about his enemies. Against the latter he ceased not to use the five arts, namely—dividing the kingdom, bribes, mischief-making, negotiations, and brute-force—especially the two first and the last. His forethought and prudence taught him to regard all his nearest neighbours and his allies as hostile. The powers beyond those natural enemies he considered friendly because they were the foes of his foes. And all the remotest nations he looked upon as neutrals, in wishes or in proviso tional state as it were, till they became either his neighbours' neighbours, or his own neighbours, that is to say, his friends or his foes.

This important duty finished he dined, and at the end of the third watch he retired to sleep, which was not allowed to last beyond three hours. In the sixth watch he arose and purified himself. The seventh was devoted to holding private consultations with his ministers, and to furnishing the officers of government with requisite instructions. The eighth or last watch was spent with the Purohita or priest, and with Brahmake, having the dawn with its appropriate rites; he then bathed, made the customary offerings, and prayed in some unfrequented place near pure water.

And throughout these occupations he bore in mind the duty of kings, namely—to pursue every object till it be accomplished; to succour all dependants, and hospitably to receive guests, however numerous. He was generous to his subjects respecting taxes, and kind of speech; yet he was inexorable in death in the punishment of offences. He reigned hunted, and he visited his pleasure gardens only on stated days. He acted in his own dominions with justice; he chastised foreign foes with rigour; he behaved generously to Brahmake, and he avoided favouritism amongst his friends. In war he never slew a suppliant, a spectator, a person asleep or undressed, or any one that showed fear. Whatever country he conquered, other kings were presented to its gods, and effects and money were given to the Brahmake. But what benefited him most was his attention to the creature comforts of the Nine Gems of Science: those eminent men ate and drank themselves into fits of enthusiasm, and ended by immortalising their patron's name.

Become Vikram the Great he established his court at a delightful and beautiful location with the best of water. The country was difficult of access, and artificially made incapable of supporting a host of invaders, but near the town four great roads met. It was surrounded with durable ramparts, having gates of defence therein, and near it was a fortress of mountains under the especial charge of a great captain.

The capital was well garrisoned and provisioned, and it surrounded the royal palace, a noble building without as well as within. Garrisons seemed embodied there, and Prosperity had made her own. The nearer ground, viewed from the terraces and pleasure pavilions, was a lovely mingling of rock and mountain, plain and valley, field and fallow, crystal lakes and glittering stream. The banks of the winding Lavana were fringed with meads whose herbage, pearly with morning dew, afforded choicest grazing for the sacred cow, and were dotted with perfumed clumps of Bo-trees, tamarind, and holy figs: in one place Vikram planted 100,000 in a single orchard and gave them to the Brahmake. The river valley separated the stream from a belt of forest growth which extended to a hill range, dark with impervious jungle, and here and there cleared for the cultivators' village. Behind it, rose another range, wooded with a lower bush and already blue with air, whilst in the background towered range upon range, here rising abruptly into points and peaks, there ramp-shaped or wall-formed, with sheers descents, and all of light azure hue adorned with glories of silver and gold.

After reigning for some years, Vikram the Brave found himself, at the age of thirty, a staid and sober middle-aged man. He had several sons—daughters are naught in India—by his several wives, and he had some paternal affection for nearly all—except, of course, for his eldest son, a youth who conducted himself as though he had a claim to the succession. In fact, the king seemed to have taken up his abode for life at Ujjayani, when suddenly he bethought himself, 'I must visit those countries of whose name I am ever hearing.' The fact... is he had determined to spy out in disguise the lands of all his foes, and to find the best means of bringing against them his formidable army.

We now learn how Bhartari Raja becomes Regent of Ujjain.

Having thus resolved, Vikram the Brave gave the government into the charge of a younger brother, Bhartari Raja, and, in the garb of a religious mendicant, accompanied by Dharma Dhveji, his second son, a youth bordering on the age of puberty, he began to travel from city to city, and from forest to forest.

The regent was of a settled melancholic turn of mind, having lost in early youth a very peculiar wife. One day, whilst out hunting, he happened to pass a funeral pyre, upon which a Brahman's widow had just become Suti (Suttee) with the greatest fortitude. On his return home he related the adventure to Sita Rani, his spouse, and she at once made reply that virtuous women die with their husbands, killed by the fire of grief, not by the flames of the pile. To prove her truth the prince rode forth to the chase gaver an affectionate farewell, and presently sent back the suite with his robes torn and stained, to report his accidental death. Sita perished upon the spot, and the widower remained inconsolable for a time.

He led the dullest of lives, and took to himself sundry spouses, all equally distinguished for birth, beauty and modesty. Like his brother, he performed all the ceremonies of a raja, rising before the day to finish his ablutions, to worship the gods, and to do due obeisance to the Brahmins. He then ascended the throne to judge his people according to the Shashtra, carefully keeping in subjection lust, anger, avarice, folly, drunkenness and pride; preserving himself from being seduced by the love of gain and of the chase; restraining his desire for dancing, singing, and playing upon musical instruments, and restraining from sleep during daylight, from molesting men of worth, from dice, from putting human beings to death by artful means, from useless travel, and from holding any one guilty without the commission of a crime. His loves were in a hall decently splendid, and he was distinguished only by an umbrella of peacocks' feathers; he received all complainants, petitioners, and presenters of offences with kind looks and soft words. He united to himself the seven or eight wise counsellors, and the sober and virtuous secretary that formed the high cabinet of his royal brother, and they met in some secret lonely spot, a mountain, a terrace, a bower or a forest, whence women, parrots and other talkative birds were carefully excluded.

And at the end of this useful and somewhat laborious day, he retired to his apartments, and after listening to spiritual songs and to soft music, he fell asleep. Sometimes he would summon his brother's Nine Gems of Science, and give ear to their learned discourses. But it was observed that the viceroy reserved this exercise for nights when he was troubled with insomnia — the words of wisdom being to him an infallible remedy for that disorder.

Thus passed onwards his youth, doing nothing that he could desire, forbidden all pleasures because they were unprincely, and working in the palace harder than in the pauper's hut. Having, however, fortunately for himself, few predictions and no imagination, he began to pride himself upon being a philosopher. Much business from an early age had dulled his wits, which were never of the most brilliant; and in the steadily increasing torpidity of his spirit, he traced the germs of that quietude which forms the highest happiness of man in this storm of matter called the world. He therefore allowed himself but one friend of his soul. He retained, I have said, his brother's seven or eight ministers; he was constant in attendance upon the Brahman priests who officiated at the palace, and who kept the impious from touching sacred property; and he was conversant with the commander-in-chief who directed his warriors, to the officers of justice who inflicted punishment upon offenders, and to the lords of towns, varying in number from one to a thousand. But he placed an intimate of his own in the high position of confidential councillor, the ambassador to regulate war and peace.

Mali-pala was a person of noble birth, endowed with shining abilities, popular, dexterous in business, acquainted with foreign parts, famed for eloquence and intrepidity, and as Menn the Lawyer advises, remarkably handsome.

Bhartari Raja, as I have said, became a quietist and a philosopher. Bat Kama, 1 the bright god who exerts his sway over the three worlds, heaven and earth and dreadful haves, 2 had marked out the prince once more as the victim of his blossom-tipped shafts and his flowery bow. How, indeed, could he hope to escape the doom which had fallen equally upon Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver, and dreadful Shiva the Three-eyed Destroyer? 3

By reason of her exceeding beauty, her face was a full moon shining in the clearest sky; her hair was the purple cloud of autumn, gravel with rain, it hangs low over earth; and her complexion mocked the pale waxen hue of the large-flowered jasmine. Her eyes were those of the timid antelope; her lips were red as those of the pomegranate's bud, and when they opened, from them distilled a fountain of ambrosia. Her neck was like a pigeon's; her hand the pink lining of the conch-shell; her waist a leopard's; her feet the softest lotuses. In a word, a model of grace and loveliness was Dangal Rani, Raja Bhartari's last and youngest wife.

The warrior laid down his arms before her; the politician spoke out every secret in her presence. The religious prince would have slaughtered a cow—that sole unforgivable sin—to save one of her eyelashes; the absolute king would not drink a cup of water without her permission; the saint philosopher, the sober quietist, to win from her the shadow of a smile, would have danced before her like a singing-girl. So desperately enamoured became Bhartari Raja!

It is written, however, that love alas! breeds not love; and so it happened to the regent. The warmth of his affection, instead of animating his wife, annoyed her; his protestations wearied her; his vows grieved her the headache; and his caresses were a Coleb that made her blood run cold. Of course, the prince perceived nothing, being lost in wonder and admiration of the beauty's coyness and coquetry. And as women must give away their hearts, whether asked or not, so the lovely Dangal Rani lost no time in lavishing all the treasures of her idle soul upon Ranbhir, the handsome ambassador of peace and war. By this means, all three were happy and were contented; their felicity, however, being built upon a rotten foundation, could not long endure. It soon ended in the following extraordinary way.

1 The Hindu Cupid.
2 Patala, the regions beneath the earth.
3 The Hindu Triad.

The Brahman and his wife, being old and poor, and having nothing else to do, had applied themselves to the practice of austere devotion. They fasted and refrained from drink; they stood on their heads, and they held their arms for weeks in the air; they prayed till their knees were like pads; they disciplined themselves with scourges of wire; and they walked about unclad in the cold season, and in summer sat within a circle of flaming wood, till they became the envy and admiration of all the pious gods that inhabit the lower heavens.

In fine, as a reward for their exceeding piety, the venerable pair received at the hands of a celestial messenger an apple of the tree Kalpavriksha—a fruit which has the virtue of conferring eternal life upon him that tastes it.

Sarcevly had the god disappeared, when the Brahman, opening his toothless mouth, prepared to eat the fruit of immortality. Then his wife addressed him in these words, shedding copious tears the while:

'To die, O man, is a passing pain: to be poor is an interminable anguish. Surely our present lot is the penalty of some great crime committed by us in a past state of being. But Calimah, is this the state of life? Better we die at once, and so escape the woes of the world!'

Hearing these words, the Brahman sat undecided, with open jaws and eyes fixed upon the apple. Presently he found tongue: 'I have accepted the fruit, and have brought it here; but having heard thy speech, my wits have been sharpened, and now I will do whatever thou pointest out.'

The wife resumed her discourse, which had been interrupted by a more than usual copious flow of tears: 'Moreover, O husband, we are old, and what are the enjoyments of the stricken in years? Truly quoth the poet—

'Die loved in youth, not hated in age.'

If that fruit could have restored thy dimmed eyes, and deaf ears, and blunted taste, and wrinkled face, I had not spoken to thee thus.

After which the Brahman threw away the apple, to the great joy of his wife, who felt a natural indignation at the prospect of seeing her husband become immortal, whilst she still remained subject to the laws of death; but she concealed this motive in the depths of her heart, enlargeing, as women are apt to do, upon everything but the truth. And she spoke with such success, that the priest was about to toss in his rage the heavenly fruit into the fire, reproaching the gods as if by sending it they had done him an injury. Then the wife snatched it out of his hand, and telling him that it was too precious to be wasted, bade him arise and gird his loins and went him to the regent's palace, and offer him the fruit—as King Vikram was absent—with a right reverend brahmanical benediction. She concluded with impressing upon him the necessity of requiring a large sum of money as a return for his inestimable gift. 'By this means,' she said, 'thou mayst pro

1 Or Avanti, also called Padmarati. It is the first meridian of the Hindus, who find their longitudes by observation of lunar eclipses, calculated for it and Lanka, or Ceylon. The clepsydra was used for taking time.
2 In the original only the husband, 'practised austere devotion.' For the benefit of those who are only familiar with the 'pious wife' as an institution, I have extended the privilege.
3 A Moslem would say, 'This is our fate.' A Hindu refers at once to metempsychosis, as naturally as a modern Swedeborgian.

1868]

Tales of Indian Devily.

1868] 419

Note thy present and future welfare.'

Then the Brahman went forth, and standing in the presence of the raja, told him all things touching the fruit, concluding with, 'O mighty prince! vouchsafe to accept this tribute, and bestow wealth upon me. I shall be happy in your living long.'

Bhartari Raja, led the supplicant into an inner strong-room, where stood heaps of the finest gold-dust, and bade him carry away all that he could; this the priest did, not forgetting to fill even his reverend and toothless mouth with the precious metal. Having dismissed the devotee groaning under the burden, the regent entered the apartments of his wives, and, having summoned the beautiful Queen Dangalap Rani, gave her the fruit, and said, 'Eat this, light of my eyes! This fruit—joy of my heart!—will make thee everlasting young and beautiful.'

The pretty queen, placing both hands upon her husband's bosom, kissed his eyes and lips, and sweetly smiling on his face—for great is the guile of women—whispered, 'Eat it thyself, dear one, or at least share it with me; for what is life and what is youth without the presence of those we love?' But the raja, whose heart was melted by these unusual words, put her away tenderly, and, having explained that the fruit would serve for only one person, departed.

Whereupon the pretty queen, sweetly smiling as before, slipped the precious present into her pocket. When the regent was transacting business in the hall of audience she sent for the ambassador who regulated war and peace, and presented him with the apple in a manner at least as tender as that with which it had been offered to her.

Then the ambassador, after slipping the fruit into his heart also, retired from the presence of the pretty queen, and meeting Laksha, one of the maids of honour, explained to her its wonderful power, and gave it to her as a token of his love. But the maid of honour, being an ambitious girl, determined that the fruit was a fit present to set before the regent in the absence of the king. Bhartari Raja accepted it, bestowed on her great wealth, and dismissed her with many thanks.

He then took up the apple and looked at it with eyes brim full of tears, for he knew the whole extent of his misfortune. His heart ached, he felt a leathening for the world, and he said with sighs and groans:

'Of what value are these delusions of wealth and affection, whose sweetness endures for a moment and becomes eternal bitterness? Love is like the drunkard's cup: delicious is the first drink, pulling are the draughts that succeed it, and most distasteful are the dregs. What is life but a restless vision of imaginary pleasures and of real pains, from which the only waking is the terrible day of death? The affection of this world is of no use, since in consequence of it, we fall at last into hell. For which reason it is best to practise theusterities of religion, that the Deity may bestow upon us hereafter that happiness which he refuses to us here!'

Thus did Bhartari Raja determine to abandon the world. But before setting out for the forest, he could not refrain from seeing the queen once, so hot was the flame

1 Amongst the Hindus, money opens the gate of heaven; in Europe, it delivers you from the pains of purgatory.
2 This part of the introduction will remind the reader of the two royal brothers and their false wives in the introduction to the Arabian Nights. The fate of Bhartari Raja, however, is historical.
which Kama had kindled in his heart. He therefore went to the apartment of his women, and hav- ing caused Dangalah Rani to be summoned, he asked her what had become of the fruit which he had given to her. She answered that, according to his command, she had eaten it. Upon which the regent shook her the apple, and seeing it stood aghast, unable to make any reply. The raja gave careful orders for her Nedding; he then went out, and having had the throne to be a jogi, or religious mendicant, and without communicating with any one departed into the jungle. There he became such a devotee that death had no power over him, and he was wandering still.

We are next told how the valiant Vikram returned to his own country.

Thus Vikram’s throne remained empty. When the news reached King Indra, Regent of the Lower Firmament and Protector of Earthly Monarchs, he sent Prithwi Pala, a fierce giant, to defend the city of Ujjayani till such time as its lawful monarch might reappear, and the guardian used to keep watch and ward night and day over his trust.

In less than a year the valorous Raja Vikram became thoroughly tired of wandering about the woods half dead; now suffering from famine, then exposed to the attacks of wild beasts, and at all times very ill at ease. He reflected also that he was not doing his duty to his wives and children; that the heir-apparent would probably make the worst use of the parental absence; and finally, that his subjects, deprived of his fatherly care, had been left in the hands of a man who, for aught he could say, was not worthy of the high trust. (He had also spies out all the weak points of friend and foe.) Whilst these and other equally weighty considerations were hanging about the raja’s mind, he heard a rumor of the state of things spread abroad, that Bhartari, the regent, having abdicated his throne, had gone away into the forest. Then quoth Vikram to his son, “We have ended our wayfarings, let us turn our steps homewards!”

The gong was striking the mysterious hour of midnight as the king and the young prince approached the principal gate. And they were pushing through it when a monstrous figure rose up before them and called out with a fearful voice, “Who are ye, and where are ye going? Stand and deliver your names!”

“I am Raja Vikram,” rejoined the king, half choked with excitement; “and I am come to mine own city. Who art thou that dost stop or stay me?”

“That question is easily answered,” cried Prithwi Pala the giant, in his roaring voice; “the gods have sent me to protect Ujjayani. If thou be really Raja Vikram, prove thyself a man: first fight with me, and then return to thine own.”

The warrior king cried “Sadhu!” wanting nothing better. He got his girdle tight round his loins, summoned his opponent into the empty space beyond the gate, told him to stand on guard, and presently began to devise some means of closing with or running in upon him. The giant’s fists were large as water melons, and his knotted arms whistled through the air like falling trees, threatening fatal blows. Besides which, the raja’s head scarcely reached the giant’s stomach, and the latter, each time he struck out, whooped so abominably loud, that no human nerves could remain unshaken.

At last Vikram’s good luck prevailed. The giant’s left foot slipped, and the hero, seizing his antagonist’s other leg, began to trip him up. At the same moment the young prince, hastening to his parent’s assistance, jumped viciously upon the enemy’s naked toes. By their united exertions they brought him to the ground, when the son sat down upon his stomach, making himself as weighty as he well could, whilst the father, climbing up to the monster’s throat, placed himself astride upon it, and pressing both thumbs upon his eyes, threatened to blind him if he would not yield.

Then the giant, modifying the bellow of his voice, cried out: “O raja, thou hast overthrown me, and I grant thee thy life.”

“Surely thou art mad, monster,” replied the king in jeering tone, half laughing, half angry. “To whom greatest thou life? If I desire it I can take thee; how, then, dost thou talk about granting me thy life?”

Vikram of Ujjayani,” said the giant, “be not too proud! I will save thee from a nearly impending death. Only hearken to the tale which I have to tell thee, and use thy judgment and act upon it. So shalt thou rule the world free from care, and live without danger, and die happily.”

“Proceed,” quoth the raja, after a moment’s thought, dismounting from the giant’s throat, and beginning to listen with all his ears.

The world is in the hands of the four elements, and when in a sitting posture, began in solemn tones to speak as follows:

“In short, the history of the matter is, that three men were born in this same good city of Ujjayani, in the same lunar mansion, in the same division of the great circle described upon the ecliptic, and in the same period of time. Yon, the first, were born in the house of a king. The second was an oilman’s son, who was slain by the third, a jogi or ascetic, who kills all he can, wafting the sweet scent of human sacrifice to the nostrils of Durga, goddess of destruction. Moreover, the reverend man, after compassing the death of the oilman’s son, has suspended him head downwards from a mimosea tree in a cemetery. He is now anxiously plotting thy destruction. He hath murdered his own child.”

“And how came an anchorite to have a child?” asked Raja Vikram incredulously.

“That is what I am about to tell thee,” replied the giant. “In the good days of thy generous father Gandharba-Sena, as the court was taking its pleasure in the forest, they saw a devotee, or rather a devotee’s head, protruding from a hole in the ground. The white ants had surrounded his body with a case of earth, and had made their home upon his skin. All kinds of insects and small animals crawled up and down the face, yet not a muscle moved. When that head had sung their nests to its temples, and scorpions wandered in and out of the matted and clotted hair; yet the holy hermit felt them not. He spoke to no one; he received no gifts; and had it not been for the opening of his nostrils as he continually inhaled the pungent smoke of a thorn fire man would have deemed him dead. Such were his religious austerities.

“Thy father marvelled much at the sight, and rode home in profound thought. That evening, as he sat in the hall of audience, he...”
could speak of nothing but the devotee; and his curiosity soon rose to such a pitch, that he proclaimed about the city a reward of one hundred gold pieces to any one that could bring to court this anchorite of his own free will. ‘Shortly afterwards Vasantasa, a singing and dancing girl, more celebrated for wit and beauty than for sagacity or discretion, appeared before the king, and offered for the petty indulgence of a gold bangle to bring the anchorite into the palace, carrying a baby on his shoulder. ‘The king hearing her speak was astonished, gave her a betel leaf in token that he held her to her promise, and permitted her to depart, which she did with a laugh of triumph. ‘Vasantasa went directly to the jungle, where she found the holy man faint with thirst, shivering with hunger, and half dead with heat and cold. She cautiously put out the fire. Then, having prepared a consecration, she approached from behind and rubbed upon his lips a little of the sweetmeat, which he licked up with great relish. Thereupon she made more and gave it to him. After two days of this generous diet he gained some strength, and on the third, as he felt a finger upon his mouth, he opened his eyes and said, “Why hast thou come here?” ‘The girl, who had her story in readiness, replied: “I am the daughter of a deity, and have practiced religious observances in the heavenly regions. I have now come into this forest!” And the devotee, who began to think how much more pleasant is such society than solitude, asked her where she had been, and requested to be led there. ‘Then Vasantasa, having unearthed the holy man and compelled him to purify himself, led him to the abode which she had caused to be built for herself in the wood. She explained its luxuries by the nature of her vow, which bound her to indulge in costly apparel, in food with the six flavours, and in every kind of indulgence. In course of time the hermit learned to follow her example; he gave up inhaling smoke, and he began to eat and drink as a daily occupation. ‘At length Kamaka began to trouble him. Briefly the saint and saintess were made man and wife, by the simple form of matrimony called the Gandharba-vivaha, and about ten months afterwards a son was born to them. Thus the anchorite came to have a child. ‘Remained Vasantasa’s last feat. Some months passed; then she said to the devotee her husband: “O saint! let us now having finished our devotions, perform a pilgrimage to some sacred place, that all the sins of our bodies may be washed away, after which we will die and depart into everlasting happiness.” Cajoled by these speeches, the hermit mounted his child upon his shoulder and followed her where she went—di-

1 In India, there is still a monastic order the pleasant duty of whose members is to enjoy themselves as much as possible. It has been much the same in Europe. — Extrait du ‘Lavement de l’Escurial ou du Mont Cassin, où les Célestins ont toutes sorts de commodités, nécessaires, utiles, délectables, superficies, surabondantes, puisqu’ils ont les cent mille mille, les quatre mille, les cinq mille écus de rente; et enfin de l’Abbaye de Léon, fait de laisser dormir la mémoire des moines à ceux qui l’audient.’ — Saint Augustin, de l’Oeuvre des Moines, by Le Camus, Bishop of Solley, quoted by Voir de Dieu, ‘Apocalypse.’

2 In India matrimony was recognised by the ancient Hindus, and is frequent in books. It is a kind of Scotch wedding—ultra-Caledonian—taking place by mutual consent, without any form or ceremony. The Gandharbas are heavenly ministers of Indra’s court, who are supposed to be witnesses.

1 The Hindu Sutras.

2 The powders are four, with wild-ginger root, sappan-wood, and other ingredients. Sometimes the stuff is thinned in syringes.
and golden tassels, began once more to reign.
After the first pleasures of return, the king applied himself unreservedly to good government and to eradicating the abuses which had crept into the administration during the periods of his wanderings. Mindful of the wise saying, 'if the raja did not punish the guilty, the stronger would roast the weaker like a fish on the spit,' he began the work of reform with an iron hand. He took the property of a councilor who had the reputation of taking bribes; he branded the forehead of a serf or serfman whose breath smelt of ardent spirits, and a goldsmith having been detected in fraud he ordered him to be cut to shreds with razors as the law in its mercy directs. In the case of a notorious evil speaker he opened the back of his head and had his tongue drawn through the wound. A murderer burned alive on iron beds, praying the while that Vishnu might have mercy upon their souls. His spies were ordered, as the shastra called 'The Watchmen,' to mix with robbers and thieves with a view of leading them into situations where they might most easily be entrapped, and once or twice when the fellows were too wary, he seized them and he confounded and impaled them all, thereby conclusively proving, without any mistake, that he was king of earth.

With the sex feminine he was equally severe. A woman convicted of having murdered an elderly husband in order to marry a younger man was thrown to the dogs, which speedily devoured her. He punished simple infidelity by cutting off the offender's nose—an admirable practice, which is not only a severe penalty, but also a standing warning to others, and an efficient preventative to any reoccurrence of the fault. Faithlessness combined with bad example or brazenfacedness was further treated by being led in solemn procession through the bazaar mounted on a diminutive and crop-eared donkey, with the face turned towards the crupper. After a few such examples Ujjayani became almost modest; it is the fault of man when they are not tolerably well behaved in one point at least.

Every day as Vikram sat upon the judgment-seat trying causes and delivering sentences, he narrowly observed the speech, the gestures, and the countenances of the various criminals and litigants and their witnesses. Ever suspecting women, as I have said, and holding them to be the root of all evil, he never failed when some sin or crime more horrible than usual came before him, to ask the accused, 'Who is she?' and the suddenness of the question often elicited the truth by astounding the accused. For there can be nothing thoroughly and entirely bad unless a woman is at the bottom of it; and knowing this, Raja Vikram made certain notable hits under the most improbable circumstances, which had almost given him a reputation for omniscience. But this is easily explained: a man intent upon squaring the circle will see squares in circles wherever he looks, and sometimes he will find them.

In disputed cases of money claims, the king adhered strictly to established practice, and consulted persons learned in the law. He seldom decided a cause on his own judgment, and he showed great temper and patience in bearing with rough language from irritated plaintiffs and defendants, from the informer, and from old men beyond eighty. That humble petitioners might not be baulked in obtaining access to the 'fountain of justice,' he caused an iron box to be suspended by a chain from the windows of his sleeping apartment. Every morning he ordered the box to be opened before him, and listened to all the plaints at full length. Even in this simple process he displayed abundant caution.

For, having forgotten what little of the humanities he had mastered in his youth, he would hand the paper to a secretary whose business it was to read it out before him. Later on, which occasioned the man of letters was sent into an inner room, and the petition was placed in the hands of a second scribe. Once it so happened by the bungling of the deceitful kayasths (clerks) that an important difference was found to occur in the same sheet. So upon strict inquiry one secretary lost his ears and the other his right hand. After this petitions were rarely if ever falsified.

4 The Raja Vikram attacked the cities and towns and villages of his enemies, but the people rose to a man against him, and hewing his army to pieces with their weapons, vanished him. This took place so often that he discontinued of bringing all the earth under the shadow of his umbrella.

At length on one occasion when near a village he listened to a conversation of the inhabitants. A woman having baked some cakes was giving them to her child, who leaving the edges would eat only the middle. On his asking for another cake, she cried, 'This boy's way is like Vikram's in his attempts to conquer the world.' On his enquiring 'Mother, why, what am I doing; and what has Vikram done?' 'Thou, my boy,' she replied, 'throwing away the outside of the cake eatest the middle only. Vikram also in his ambition, without subduing the frontiers before attacking the towns, invades the heart of the country and lays it waste. On that account, both the townspeople and others rise, close upon him from the frontiers to the centre, and destroy his army. That was his folly.'

Vikram took notice of the woman's words. He strengthened his army and resumed his attack on the provinces and cities, beginning with the frontiers, reducing the outer towns and stationing troops in the women's quarters. Thus he proceeded regularly with his invasions. After a respite, adopting the same system and marshalling huge armies, he reduced in regular course each kingdom and province till he became monarch of the whole world. It so happened that one day as Vikram the Brave sat upon the judgment-seat, a young merchant, by name Mal Deo, who had lately arrived at Ujjayani with loaded camels and elephants, and with the reputation of immense wealth, entered the palace court. Having been received with extreme condescension, he gave into the king's hand a fruit which he had brought in his own, and then spreading a prayer carpet on the floor sat down. Presently, after a quarter of an hour he arose and went away. When he had gone the king reflected in his mind: 'Under this disguise, perhaps, is the very man whom the giant spoke.' Suspecting this, he did not eat the fruit, but calling the master of the household he gave the present to him, ordering him to keep it in a very careful manner. The young merchant, however, once, every day to court the honour of an interview, each time presenting a similar gift.

By chance one morning Raja Vikram went, attended by his ministers, to see his stables. At this time the young merchant also arrived there, and in the usual manner placed a fruit in the royal hand. As the king was thoughtfully tossing it in the air, it accidentally fell from his fingers on the ground. Then the monkey, who was tethered amongst the horses to draw calamities from their heads, Vikram took Mal Deo aside, and began to ask him, saying, ‘O generous man! you have given me so many rubies, and even for a single day you have not eaten food with me; I am exceedingly ashamed, tell me what you desire.’

‘Raja,’ said the young merchant, ‘I am not Mal Deo, but Shanta-Shhil, a devotee. I am about to perform spells, incantations and magical rites on the banks of the river Gavadar, in a large smas-hana, a cemetery, where bodies are burned. By this means the eight powers of nature will all become mine. This thing I ask of you as alms, that you and the young prince Dharma Dhwan will pass one night with me, doing my bidding. By you remaining near me my incantations will be successful.’

The valiant Vikram nearly started from his seat at the word cemetery, but, like a ruler of men, he restrained his face from expressing his feelings, and he presently replied, ‘Good, we will come, tell us on what day you wish to have us come to you,’ said the devotee, ‘armed, but without followers, on the Monday evening the 14th of the dark half of the month Bhadra.’

‘Do you go your ways, we will certainly come,’ said the raja, having received a promise from the king, and having taken leave, the devotee returned to his house: thence he repaired to the temple, and having made preparations, and taken all the necessary things, he went back into the cemetery and sat down to his ceremonies.

The valiant Vikram, on the other hand, retired into an inner apartment, to consult his own judgment about an adventure with which trouble might befall him, and fear of ridicule, he was unwilling to acquaint even the most trustworthy of his ministers.

In due time came the moon’s day, the 14th of the dark half of the month Bhadra. As evening fell gloomily on earth, the warrior-king, accompanied by his son, with turban-ends tied under their chins, and with trusty blades tucked under their arms ready for foes, human, bestial, or devilish, slipped out unseen through the palace wicket, and took the road leading to the cemetery on the river bank.

Dark and drear was the night. Urged by the furious blast of lingering winter, masses of black cloud, like the forms of unwieldy beasts, rolled heavily over the firmament plain. Whenever the crescent of the young moon, rising from an horizon sable as the sad Tamala’s hue, glanced upon the wayfarers, it was no brighter than the fine tip of an elephant’s tusk protruding from the muddy wave. A heavy storm of rain was impending; big drops fell in showers from the forest trees as they groaned under the blast, and beneath the gloomy avenue the clayey ground gleamed ghostly white. As the raja and his son advanced, a faint ray of light, like the line of pure gold streaking the dark face of the touchstone, caught their eyes, and directed their footsteps towards the cemetery.

When Vikram came upon the open space on the river bank where corpses were burned, he hesitated for a moment to tread its impure ground. But seeing his son undismayed, he advanced boldly, trampling upon remnants of bones, and only covering his lower face with his turban-end.

Presently, at the further extremity of the smas-hana or burna-

---

1. The name means, ‘Quiescent Disposition.’
2. August. In the solar-lunar year of the Hindus the months are divided into fortnights—light and dark.
3. A flower, whose name frequently occurs in Sanskrit poetry.

---

'To God and you I recommend
My children dear this day:
But little while, be sure, we have
Within this world to stay.'

But to appeal to the moral sense of a goldsmith!

1. So the moribund father of the ‘babes in the wood’ lectures his wicked brother, their guardians:

'To God and you I recommend
My children dear this day:
But little while, be sure, we have
Within this world to stay.'

1.梯子上的人头。'In some Moslem countries a hog acts prophylactic. Hence perchance your Raja Parkh, fearing a troubleshaking pig at Ledamar,

---

1. To meditate, to self-contemplate.
2. Maha (great) raja (king): common address even to those who are not royal.
ing ground, appeared a group. By the lurid flames that flared and flickered round the half-extinguished funeral pyre, with remnants of their dreadful loads, Raja Vikram and Dharma Dhawaj could note the seven features of the ill-omened mood. There was an outer circle of hideous bestial forms; tigers were roaring, and elephants were trumpeting; wolves, whose foul hairy coats darted forth sparks of bluish phosphoric light, were devouring the remnants of human bodies; foxes, jackals, and hyenas were disputing over their prey; whilst bears were chewing the livers of children. The space within was peopled by a multitude of fiends. There were the subtle bodies of men which had escaped their grosser frames prowling about the charnel ground, where their corpses had been reduced to ashes, or hovering in the air, waiting till the new bodies which they were to animate were made ready for their reception. The spirits of those that had been foully slain wandered about with gashed limbs; and skeletons, whose moundy bones were held together by bits of blackened sinew, followed them as the murderer doth his victim. Malignant witches with shrivelled skins, horrid eyes and distorted forms, crawled and crouched over the earth; whilst spectres and goblins now stood motionless, and tall as lofty palm trees; then, as if in fits, leaped, danced, and trembled before their evacuator. The air was filled with shrill and strident cries, with the fitful moaning of the storm-wind, with the hooting of the owl, with the jackal’s long wild cry, and with the hoarse gurgling of the swollen river, from whose banks the waves reverberated the earth-slip in its fall.

In the midst of all, close to the fire which lit up his evil countenance, sat Shanta-Shil, the jogi, with the banner that denoted his calling and his magic staff planted in the ground behind him. He was clad in the ochre-coloured loin-wrap of his class; from his head streamed long tangled locks of hair like horsehair; his black body was striped with lines of chalk, and a girdle of thonged bones encircled his waist. His face was smeared with ashes from a funeral pyre, and his eyes, fixed on a statue, gleamed from this mask with an infernal light of hate. His cheeks were shaven, and he had not forgotten to draw the horizontal sectarian mark. But this was of blood, and Vikram, as he drew near, saw that he was playing upon a human skull with two shank bones, making music for the horrid revelry.

Now Raja Vikram, as has been shown by his encounter with Indra’s watchman, was a bold prince, and he was cautious as he was brave. The sight of a human being in the midst of these terrors raised his mettle; he determined to prove himself a hero, and feeling that the critical moment was now come, he hoped to rid himself and his house for ever of the family curse that hovered over them. For a moment he thought of the giant’s words, ‘And remember that it is lawful and right to strike off his head that would slay thee.’ A stroke with his good sword might at once and effectually put an end to the danger. But then he remembered how he had passed his royal word to do the devotee’s bidding that night. Besides, he felt assured that the horn for action had not yet sounded.

These reflections having passed through his mind with the rapid course of a star that has lost its honours, Vikram courteously saluted Shanta-Shil. The jogi briefly replied, ‘Come, sit down, both of ye.’ The father and son took their places, by no means frightened or alarmed by the devil dances before and around them. Presently the valiant raja reminded the devotee that he was come to perform his promise, and lastly asked, ‘What commands are there for us?’

The jogi replied, ‘O king, since you have come, just perform one piece of business. About two kos hence, in a southerly direction, there is another place where dead bodies are burned; and in that place is a mimoos tree, on which a body is hanging. Bring it to me immediately.’

Raja Vikram took his son’s hand, unwilling to leave him in such company; and, catching up a fire-brand, went rapidly away in the proper direction. He was now certain that Shanta-Shil was the anchorite who, enraged by his father, had resolved his destruction; and his uppermost thought was a firm resolve ‘to breakfast upon his enemy, ere his enemy could remit upon him.’ He muttered this old saying as he went, whilst the tom-tomming of the anchorite upon the skull resounded in his ears, and the devil-crowd, which had held its peace during his meeting with Shanta-Shil, broke out again in an infernal din of whoops and screams, yells and laughter.

The darkness of the night was frightful, the gloom deepened till it was hardly possible to walk. The clouds opened their fountains, raining so that you would say they could never rain again. Lightning blazed forth with more than the light of day, and the roar of the thunder made the earth to shake. Baleful gleams tipped the black cones of the trees and the fitfully scamped like fireflies over the waste. Unclean goblins dogged the travellers and threw themselves upon them in their path and obstructed them in a thousand different ways. Huge snakes, whose mouths distilled blood and black venom, kept clinging around their legs in the roughest part of the road, till they were persuaded to loosen their hold either by the sword or by reciting a spell. In fact there were so many horrors and such a tumult and noise that even a brave man would have faltered, yet the king kept on his way.

At length having passed over, somehow or other, a very difficult road, the raja arrived at the smashana or burning place pointed out by the jogi. Suddenly he sighted the tree where from root to top every branch and leaf was in a blaze of crimson flame. And when he still dauntless advanced towards it a flamour continued to be raised and voices kept crying, ‘Kill them! Kill them! Seize them! Seize them! Take care that they do not get away! Let them scorch themselves to cinders! let them suffer the pains of Patala.’

Far from being terrified by this state of things the valiant raja increased in boldness, seeing a prospect of an end to his adventure. Approaching the tree he felt that the fire did not burn him, and so he sat there for a while to observe the body, which hung, head downwards, from a branch a little above him. Its eyes, which were wide open, were of a greenish brown, and never twinkled; its hair also was brown; and brown was its face—three several shades which, notwithstanding, approached one another in an unpleasant way, as in an over-dried cocoa-nut. It was body thin and ribbed like a skeleton or a bamboo framework, and as it held on with a cord, like a flying fox, by the toe-tips, its drawn muscles stood out like as if they were ropes of coir. Blood it appeared to have none or there would have been a decided determination of that current to the head; and as the raja handled its skin, it felt icy cold and clammy as might a snake.

¹ A measure of length, each two miles.
² The warm region below.
³ Hindus admire only glossy black hair: the ‘bunty brown hair’ loved by our ballads is assigned by them to low-caste men, witches, and fiends.

The only sign of life was the whisking of a ragged little tail much resembling a goat's.

Judging from these signs the brave king at once determined the creature to be a Baiyal—a Vampire. For a short time he was puzzled to reconcile the appearance with the words of the giant, who informed him that the ancestor had hung the oilman's son to a tree. But soon he explained to himself the difficulty, remembering the exceeding cunning of jogis and other revered men, and determining that his enemy, the better to deceive him, had doubtless altered the shape and form of the young oilman's body.

With this idea, Vikram was pleased, saying, 'My trouble has been productive of fruit.' Remained the task of carrying the Vampire to Shanta-Shill the devotee. Having taken his sword, the raja fearlessly climbed the tree, and ordering his son to stand away from below, clutched the Vampire's hair with one hand, and with the other struck such a blow of the sword, that the cord was cut and the thing fell heavily upon the ground. Immediately on falling it grappled its teeth, and began to utter a loud wailing cry like the screams of an infant in pain. Vikram having heard the sound of its lamentations, was pleased, and began to say to himself, 'This devil must be slain.' Then nimbly sliding down the trunk, he made a captive of the body, and asked 'Who art thou?'

Scarcely, however, had the words passed the royal lips, when the Vampire slipped through the fingers like a worm, and uttering a loud shout of laughter, rose in the air with its legs uppermost, and suspended itself by its toes to the cord as before. And there it swung to and fro, moved by the violence of its cachinnation.

'Decidedly this is the young oilman!' exclaimed the raja, after he had stood for a minute or two with mouth open, gazing upwards and wondering what he should do next. Presently he directed Dharmadhwan not to lose an instant in laying hands upon the thing when it next might touch the ground, and then he again swarmed up the tree. Having reached his former position, he once more seized the Baiyal's hair, and with all the force of his arms—for he was beginning to feel really angry—he tore it from its hold and dashed it to the ground, saying, 'O wretch, tell me who thou art?'

Then, as before, the raja slid deftly down the trunk, and hurried to the aid of his son, who, in obedience to orders, had fixed his grasp upon the Vampire's neck. Then too, as before, the Vampire, laughing aloud, slipped through their fingers and returned to its former dangling-place.

To fail twice was too much for Raja Vikram's temper, which was right kindly and somewhat hot. This time he bade his son strike the Baiyal's head with his sword. Then, more like a wounded bear of Himalaya than a prince who had established an era, he leaped up the tree, and dealt a furious blow with his sabre at the Vampire's

1 The Hindus, like the European classics and other ancient peoples, reckon four ages:—The Satya Yug, or Golden Age, numbered 1,728,000 years; the second, or Treta Yug, comprised 1,726,000; the Dwapar Yuga had 84,000; and the present, the Kali Yug, has shrunk to 3,500 years.
2 Especially alluding to prayer. On this point, Soutieh justly remarks (Preface to Curse of Kohapat).—'In the religion of the Hindoos there is one remarkable peculiarity. Prayers, penances, and sacrifices are supposed to possess an inherent and actual value, in no degree depending upon the disposition or motive of the person who performs them. They are drafts upon heaven for which the gods cannot refuse payment. The worst man who upon the worst design, have in this manner obtained power which has made them formidable to the supreme deities themselves.' Moreover, the Hindoo gods bear the prayers of those who desire the evil of others. Hence when a rich man beseeches his friends to pray how sharp are men's teeth! and, 'He is ruined because others could not bear to see his happiness!'
HOW TO SAVE IRELAND FROM AN ULTRAMONTANE UNIVERSITY.

DR. NEWMAN describes a University as 'a place of teaching universal knowledge,' a school of universal learning.' It may be questioned whether the unity implied in the name is not as applicable to the bringing together into one group the different classes of society who are to be educated, as to the aggregation of the subjects of study. But however we explain the name, the importance of the University, as the foundation, not of learning merely, but of all education, is now everywhere recognised. If a University is doing its proper work, it is the heart of all the intellectual labour of the community, and from it comes the life-blood of knowledge that circulates through every extremity of the educational system. This was the view of Napoleon when he commenced his national system of education, not by establishing primary schools, but by founding the University of France. It is not alone the class who can afford to keep their sons at a University who are concerned in the existence of such an institution. The real function of a University is to send forth quantities of mental power in such a condition as to permeate all the strata of society. Another most important work of our Universities is to open a path for men of genius and scholastic tastes, by which they may come forth from among the humblest classes, and enter upon that field of work to which their faculties will fit them. In Ireland, this office of bringing the different classes together for the purpose of intellectual training, of recruiting the higher ranks by selection from the lower, of affording a common centre of intellectual labour, is a task which the circumstances of the nation make very urgent, but which those same circumstances make peculiarly difficult. Accordingly, the State has already made several attempts to come at a settlement of this question of University Education. While in England it is still urged, as before Mr. Ewart's Committee last year, that the State should hesitate to precipitate matters by meddling, in Ireland the only question is how the State is to meddle. The danger is that the interference may be in a wrong direction; that political exigencies may obtain from the Government measures opposed to the spirit of educational progress, and most mischievous to the present condition of Ireland. Happily the present Government are pledged not to attempt anything without consulting Parliament. Whatever plan Lord Mayo may adopt, it must be discussed in the House of Commons before any step is taken to carry it into execution. The advocates of a separate charter for the Roman Catholic College in Dublin are very sanguine that this is the measure which the Government will offer. On the other hand, there is Mr. Monsell's plan for remodelling the University of Dublin so as to make room within it for a Roman Catholic College; and there is Mr. Fawcett's, to throw open the government of Trinity College to all Dissenters, without regarding the peculiar function of that college as a training school for the clergy of the Established Church.

The prominence which this question has assumed in Irish politics is very remarkable. The Roman Catholic hierarchy have been for the last fifteen years unceasing in their demand for a separate University for the laity of their church. That this agitation originated with the hierarchy alone is established; that it is directed, in furtherance of
VIKRAM AND THE VAMPIRE; OR, TALES OF INDIAN DEVILRY.

Adapted by

Richard F. Burton,
Vice-President, Anthropological Society, London.

THE VAMPIRE'S SECOND STORY.

OF THE RELATIVE ILKNESS OF MEN AND WOMEN.

In the great city of Bhogavati dwell, once upon a time, a young prince, concerning whom I may say that he strikingly resembled this amiable son of your majesty.

Raja Vikram was silent, nor did he acknowledge the Baillie's indirect compliment. He hated flattery, but he liked, when flattered, to be flattered in his own person; a feature in their royal patron's character which the Nine Gems of Science had turned to their own account.

Now the young prince Raja Rana (continued the tale teller) had an old father, concerning whom I may say that he was exceedingly unlike your rajahship, both as a man and as a parent. He was fond of hunting, fishing, sleeping by day, drinking at night, eating perpetual tonics, the idleness of watching wanton girls, and the vanity of telling in love. But he was adored by his children because he took the trouble to win their hearts. He did not lay it down as a law of heaven that his offspring would assuredly go to Patala if they neglected the duty of bestowing upon him without cause all their affections, as your moral, virtuous, and highly respectable fathers are only too apt—Ai! Ai!

These sounds issued from the Vampire's lips as the warrior king, speechless with wrath, passed his hand behind his back, and viciously twisted up a pinch of the speaker's skin. This caused the Vampire to cry aloud, more however, it would appear, in derision than in real suffering, for he presently proceeded with the same subject.

Fathers, great king, may be divided into three kinds; and be it said aside, that mothers are the same. Firstly, we have the parent of many ideas, amusing, pleasant of course, poor, and the idol of his children. Secondly, there is the parent with one idea and a half. This sort of man would, in your place, say to himself, 'That demon fellow speaks a manner of truth. I am not above learning from him, despite his position in life. I will carry out his theory; just to see how far it goes;' and, so saying, he wends his way home, and treats his young ones with prodigious kindness for a time, but it is not lasting. Thirdly, there is the real one idea's type of parent—yourself, O warrior king Vikram, an admirable example. You learn in youth what you are taught: for instance, the blessed precept that the green stick is of the trees of Paradise; and in age you practise what you have learned. You cannot teach yourselves anything before your beards sprout, and when they grow stiff you cannot be taught by others. If any one attempt to change your opinions you cry,

What is new is not true,
What is true is not new,
and you rudely pull his hand from the subject. Yet have you your uses like other things of earth. In life you are good working camels for the mill-track, and when you die your ashes are not worse compost than those of the wise.

Your rajahship will observe (continued the Vampire, as Vikram began to show symptoms of ungovernable anger) that I have been concise in treating this digression. Had I not been so, it would have led me far indeed from my tale. Now to return.

When the old king became air mixed with air, the young king, though he found hardly ten pieces of silver in the personal treasury and legacies for thousands of golden ounces, yet mourned his loss with the deepest grief. He easily explained to himself the reckless emptiness of the royal coffers as a proof of his dear kind parent's good use, because he loved him.

But the old man had left behind him, as he could not carry it off with him, a treasure more valuable than gold and silver: one Churaman, a parrot, who knew the world, and who besides discourse in the most correct Sanscrit. By sage counsel and wise guidance this admirable bird soon repaired his young master's shattered fortunes.

One day the prince said, 'Parrot, then know everything: tell me where there is a mate fit for me. The shastras inform us, respecting the choice of a wife, 'She who is not descended from his paternal or maternal ancestors within the sixth degree is eligible by a high caste man for nuptials.' In taking a wife let him studiously avoid the following families, be they ever so great, or ever so rich in kine, goats, sheep, gold, or grain: the family which has omitted prescribed acts of devotion; that which has produced no male children; that in which the Veda (scripture) has not been read; that which has thick hair on the body; and those in which members have been subject to hereditary disease. Let a person choose for his wife a girl whose parent has no defect; who has an agreeable name; who walks gracefully, like a young elephant; whose hair and teeth are moderate respectively in quantity and in size; and whose body is of exquisite softness.'

'Great king,' responded the parrot Churaman, 'there is in the country of Magadh a raja, Magadheswar by name, and he has a daughter called Chandravati. You will marry her; she is very learned, and what is better far, very fair. She is of yellow colour, with a nose like the flower of the sesamum; her legs are taper, like the phantastree; her eyes are large, like the principal leaf of the lotus; her eyebrows stretch towards her ears; her lips are red, like the young leaves of the mango-tree; her face is like the full moon; her voice is like the sound of the cuckoo; her arms reach to her knees; her throat is like the pigeon's; her flanks are thin, like those of the lion; her hair hangs in curls only down to her waist; her teeth are like the seeds of the pomegranate; and her gait is that of the drunken elephant or the goose.'

On hearing the parrot's speech, the king sent for an astrologer, and asked him, 'Whom shall I marry?' The wise man, having consulted his art, replied, 'Chandravati is the name of the maiden, and your marriage with her will certainly take place.' Thereupon the young raja, though he had never seen his future queen, became incontinent enamoured of her. He summoned a Brahman, and sent him to King Magadheswar, saying, 'If you arrange satisfactorily this affair of our marriage we will reward you amply'—a promise which sent wings to the priest.

Now it so happened that this talented and beautiful princess had a jay, whose name was Madanmanjari or Love-garland. She also possessed encyclopedic knowledge.

1 In the original a 'Maina,' Gracula religiosa.
after her degree, and like the parrot, she spoke excellent Sanscrit.

Be it briefly said, O warrior king— for you think that I am talking fables—that in the days of old, men had the art of making birds discourse in human language. The invention is attributed to a great philosopher, who split their tongues, and, after many generations produced a selected race born with those members split. He altered the shapes of their skulls by fixing ligatures behind the occiput, which caused the sinew of the tongue to protrude, their eyes to become prominent, and their brains to master the art of expressing thoughts in words.

But this wonderful discovery, like those of great philosophers generally, had in it a terrible practical flaw. The birds beginning to speak, spoke so wisely and so well, they told the truth so persistently, they rebuked their brethren of the featherless skin so openly, they flattered them so little and they counselled them so much, that mankind presently grew tired of hearing them discourse. Thus the art gradually fell into disuse, and now it is numbered with the things that were.

One day the charming Princess Chandra-sati was sitting in confidential conversation with her parrot. The dialogue was not remarkable, for maidsens in all ages seldom consult their confidants or speculate upon the secrets of futurity, or ask to have dreams interpreted, except upon one subject. At last the princess said, for perhaps the hundredth time that month, 'Where, O jay, is there a husband worthy of me?'

'Princess,' replied Madan-manjari, 'I am happy at length to be able to satisfy your just curiosity. For just it is, though the delicacy of our sex—'

'Now, no preaching!' said the maiden; 'or thou shalt have salt instead of sugar for supper.

days, your rashship, are food of sugar. So the confidante retained a quantity of good advice which she was about to produce, and replied,

'I now see clearly the ways of Fortune. Raja Ram, king of Bhogavati, is to be thy husband. He shall be happy in thee and thou in him, for he is young and handsome, rich and generous, good-tempered, not too clever, and without a chance of being an invalid.'

Thereupon the princess, although she had never seen her future husband, at once began to love him. In fact, though neither had set eyes upon the other, both were mutually in love.

'How can that be, sire?' asked the young Dharma Dhwaj of his father. 'I always thought that—'

'The great Vikram interrupted his son, and bade him not to ask silly questions. Thus he expected to neutralise the evil effects of the Baital's doctrine touching the amiability of parents unlike himself.

Now, as both these young people (resumed the Baital) were of princely family and well to do in the world, the course of their love was unusually smooth. When the Brahman sent, by Raja Ram, had reached Magadh, and had delivered his king's hommage to the Raja Magadhshwar, the latter received him with distinction, and agreed to his proposal. The beautiful princess's father sent for a Brahman of his own, and charging him with nuptial gifts and the customary presents, sent him back to Bhogavati in company with the other envoy, and gave him this order, 'Greet Raja Ram, on my behalf, and after placing the tilaka or mark upon his forehead, return here with all speed. When you come back I will get all things ready for the marriage.'

Raja Ram, on receiving the deputation, was greatly pleased; and after generously rewarding the Brahman, and making all the necessary preparations, he set out in state for the land of Magadh, to claim his betrothed.

In due season the ceremony took place with feasting and bands of music, fireworks and illuminations, rehearsals of auspicious ceremonies, processions, and abundant noise. And hardly had the tumult disappeared from the beautiful hands and feet of the bride, when the bridgegroom took an affectionate kiss of his new parent—she had not lived long in the house—and receiving the dowry and the bridals gifts, set out for his own country.

Chandrvati was decreed by leaving her mother, and therefore she was allowed to carry with her the jay, Madan-manjari. She soon told her husband the wonderful way in which she had first heard his name, and he related to her the advantage which he had derived from consultation with Churaman, his parrot.

'Then why do we not put these precious creatures into one cage, after marrying them according to the rites of the angelic marriage (handharva-lagan)?' said the charming queen. Like most brides, she was highly pleased to find an opportunity of making a match.

'Ah! why not, love? Surely they cannot live happy in what the world calls single blessedness,' replied the young king. As bridegrooms sometimes are for a short time, he was very warm upon the subject of matrimony.

Thereupon, without consulting the parties chiefly concerned in their scheme, the master and mistress, after being comfortably settled at the end of their journey, caused a large cage to be brought and put into it both their favourites.

Upon which Churaman the parrot leaned his head on one side and directed a peculiar look at the jay. But Madan-manjari raised her beak high in the air, puffed through it once or twice, and turned away her face in extreme disdain.

'Perhaps,' quoth the parrot, at length breaking silence, 'you will tell me that you have no desire to be married?'

'Probably,' replied the jay.

'And why?' asked the male bird.

'Because I don't choose,' replied the female.

'Truly a feminine form of resolution this,' ejaculated the parrot.

'I will borrow your master's words and call it a woman's reason, that is to say, a reason in all. Have you any objection to be more explicit?'

'None whatever,' returned the jay, provoked by the rule of silence, and tending to telling more plainly than politely exactly what she thought; 'none whatever, sir parrot. You be things are all of you sinful, treacherous, deceitful, selfish, devoid of conscience, and accustomed to sacrifice us, the weaker sex, to your smallest desire or convenience.'

'Of a truth, fair lady,' quoth the young Raja Ram to his bride, 'this pet of thine is sufficiently impudent.'

'Let her words be as wind in thine ear, master,' interrupted the parrot.

'And pray, Mistress Jay, what are you and things but treacherous, false, ignorant, and avaricious beings; whose only wish in this world is to prevent life being as pleasant as it might be?'

'Veril, my love,' said the beautiful Chandrvati to her bridegroom, 'this thy bird has a habit of expressing his opinions in a very free and easy way.'

'I can prove what I assert,' whispered the jay in the ear of the princess.

'We can confound their feminine minds by an anecdote, whispered the parrot in the ear of the prince.

Briefly, King Vikram, it was settled between the twin that each should establish the truth of what it was advanced by an illustration in the form of a story.

Chandrvati claimed, and soon
Vikram and the Vampire; or, Tales of Indian Deevily.

obtained, precedence for the jay. Then the wonderful bird, Madamnanjari, began to speak as follows:—

"I have often told thee, O queen, that before coming to thy feet, my mistress was Ratnavati, the daughter of a rich trader, the dearest, the sweetest._'

Here the jay burst into tears, and the mistress was sympathetically affected. Presently the speaker resumed—

However, I anticipate. In the city of Ilapur there was a wealthy merchant, who was without offspring; on this account he was continually fasting and going on pilgrimage, and when at home he was ever engaged in reading the Puranas (Bible) and in giving alms to the Brahmas (priests and persons).

At length, by favour of the Deity, a son was born to this merchant, who celebrated his birth with great pomp and rejoicing, and gave large gifts to Brahmas and to bards, and distributed how much to the hungry, the thirsty, and the poor. When the boy was five years old he had him taught to read, and when older he was sent to a guru (lecturer) who had formerly himself been a student, and who was celebrated as a teacher.

In course of time the merchant's son grew up. Praise be to Brahma! what a wonderful youth it was, with a face like a monkey's, legs like a goat's, and a back like a camel's. You know the old proverb:

Expect thirty-two villains from the lumping and eighty from the one-eyed man, But when the hunchback comes, say 'Lord defend us!'

Instead of going to study, he went to gamble with other ne'er-do-wells, to whom he talked loosely, and whom he taught to be bad-hearted as himself. He made love to every woman, and despite his ugliness, he was not unsuccessful. For they are equally fortunate who are very handsome or very ugly, in so far as they are both remarkable and remarked. But the latter bear away the palm. Beautiful men begin well with women, but do they can to attract them, love them as the apples of their eyes, discover them to be fools, hold them to be their equals, deceive them, and speedily despise them. It is otherwise with the ugly man, who, in consequence of his homeliness, must work his wits and take pains with himself, and become as pleasing as he is capable of being, till women forget his ape's face, bird's legs, and clumsy back.

The hunchback, moreover, became a Tantri, so as to complete his villainies. He was duly initiated by an apostate Brahman, made a declaration that he renounced all the ceremonies of his old religion, and was delivered from their yoke and proceeded to perform in token of joy an abominable rite. In company with eight men and eight women—a Brahman female, a dancing girl, a weaver's daughter, a woman of ill-fame, a washerwoman, a barber's wife, a milkmaid, and the daughter of a land-owner—choosing the darkest time of night and the most secret part of the house, he drank with them, was sprinkled and anointed, and went through many ignoble ceremonies, such as sitting nude upon a dead body. The teacher informed him that he was not to indulge shame, nor like to anything, nor prefer one thing to another, nor regard caste, ceremonial cleanliness or uncleanness, and freely to enjoy all the pleasures of sense—that is, of course, wine and us, since we are the representatives of the wife of the woman who prevents the senses from going astray. And whereas holy men, holding that the subjugation or annihilation of the passions is essential to final beatitude, accomplish this object by bodily austerities and by avoiding temptation, he proceeded to blunt the edge of the passions with excessive indulgence. And he jeered at the pious, reminding them that their ascetics are seen only in forests and while keeping a perpetual fast; but that he could subdue his passions in the very presence of what they most desired.

Presently this excellent youth's father died, leaving him immense wealth. He blunted his passions so piously and so vigorously, that in very few years his fortune was dissipated. Then he turned towards his neighbour's goods and prospered for a time, till being discovered robbing, he narrowly escaped the stake. At length he explained, 'Let the gods perish! the rascals send me nothing but ill luck!' and so saying he arose and fled from his own country.

Chance led that villain hunchback to the city of Chandrapur, where, hearing the name of my master Hemgupt, he recollected that one of his father's wealthiest correspondents was of the same name. Thereupon, with his usual audacity, he presented himself at the house, walked in, and although he was clothed in tatters, introduced himself, told his father's name and circumstances, and wept bitterly.

The good man was much astonished and not less grieved, to see the son of his old friend in such woeful plight. He rose up, however, embraced the youth, and asked the reason of his coming. 'I had freighted a vessel,' said the false hunchback, 'for the purpose of trading to a certain land, and, having gone there, had disposed of my merchandise, and taking another cargo was on my voyage home, when suddenly a great storm arose and the vessel was wrecked and I escaped on a plank, and after a time arrived here. But I am ashamed, since I have lost all my wealth, and I cannot show my face in this plethag in my own city. My excellent father would have condoled me with his pity. But now that I have carried him and my mother to the Ganges,1 every one will turn against me; they will rejoice in my misfortunes, they will accuse me of folly and recklessness—ala! ala! I am truly miserable.'

My dear master was deceived by the cunning of the wretch. He offered him hospitality, which was readily enough accepted, and he entertained him for some time as a guest. Then, having reason to be satisfied with his conduct, Hemgupt admitted him to his secrets, and finally made him a partner in his business. Briefly, the villain played his cards so well, that at last the merchant sold to himself:

'I have had for years an anxiety and a calamity in my house. My neighbours whisper things to my disadvantage, and those who are bolder speak out with astonishment amongst themselves, saying, "seven or eight persons marry their daughters, and this indeed is the appointment of the law; that period is long since gone; she is now thirteen or fourteen years old, and she is very tall and handsome, resembling a married woman of thirty. How can her father eat his rice with comfort and sleep with satisfaction, whilst such a discrepant thing exists in his house? At present he is exposed to shame, and his ceased friends are suffering through his retaining a girl from marriage beyond the period which nature has prescribed.' And now, while I am sitting quietly at home, the Bhagwan (Deity) removes all my uneasiness; by his favour such an opportunity occurs. It is not right to delay. It is best that I should give my daughter in marriage to him. Whatever can be done to-day is best; who knows what may happen to-morrow?"'

1 As we should say, buried them.
Thus thinking, the old man went to his wife and said to her, ‘Birth, marriage, and death are all under the direction of the gods; can any one say when they will be ours? We want for our daughter a young man who is of good birth, rich and handsome, clever and honourable. But we do not find him. If the bridegroom be faulty, thou sayest, all will go wrong. I cannot put a string round the neck of our daughter and throw her into the ditch. If, however, thou think well of the merchant’s son now my partner, we will celebrate Ratanwati’s marriage with him.’

The wife, who had been won over by the hunchback’s hypocrisia, was also pleased, and replied, ‘My lord! when the Deity so plainly indicates his wish, we should do it; since, though we have sat quietly at home, the desire of our hearts is accomplished. It is best that no delay be made; and, having quickly summoned the family priest, and having fixed upon a propitious planetary conjunction, that the marriage be celebrated.’

Then they called their daughter—sh, me! what a beautiful being she was, and worthy the love of a Gandharva (demigod). Her long hair, purple with the light of youth, was glossy as the brahma’s’ wing; her brow was pure and clear as the asag; the ocean-coral looked pale beside her lips, and her teeth were as two charlets of pearls. Everything in her was formed to be loved.
Who could look into her eyes without wishing to do it again? Who could hear her voice without hoping that such music would sound once more? And she was good as she was fair. Her father adored her; her mother, though a middle-aged woman, was not envious or jealous of her, nor were her relatives doted on her, and her friends could find no fault with her. I should never end were 1 A large kind of black bee, common in India.

I to tell her precious qualities. Alas, alas! my poor Ratanwati!
So saying, the jay wept abundant tears; then she resumed:

When her parents informed my mistress of their resolution, she re-piled, ‘Sadhu—it is well!’ She was not like many women, who hate nothing so much as a man whom their seniors order them to love. She bowed her head and promised obedience, although, as she afterwards told her mother, she could hardly look at her intended, on account of his prodigious ugliness. But presently the hunch-back’s wit surmounted her disgust. She was grateful to him for his attention to her father and mother; she esteem’d him for his moral and religious conduct; she pitied him for his misfortunes, and she finished with forgetting his face, legs, and back in her admiration of what she supposed to be his mind.

She had vowed before marriage faithfully to perform all the duties of a wife, however distasteful to her they might be; but after the nuptials, which were not long deferred, she was not surprised to find that she loved her husband. Not only did she omit to think of his features and figure; I verily believe that she loved him the more for his repulsiveness. Ugly, very ugly men prevail over women for two reasons.
Firstly, we begin with repugnance, which in the course of nature turns to affection; and we all like the most that which, when accustomed to it, we most disliked. Hence the poet says, with as much truth as is in the male:

Never despain, man! when a woman’s sprite
Detects thy name, and sits at thy sight:
Sometimes her heart shall learn to love thee more
For the wild hatred which it felt before, &c.

Secondly, the very ugly man appears, deceitfully enough, to think little of his appearance, and he will give himself the trouble to pursue a heart because he knows that the heart will not desert him after. Moreover, we women (said the jay) are by nature pitiful, and this our enemies term a ‘strange perversity.’ A widow is generally disconsolate if she loses a little, wizen-faced, shrunken-shanked, ugly, spiteful, determated thing that scolded her and quarreled with her, and beat her and made her hours bitter; whereas she will follow her husband to the Ganges with exemplary fortitude if he was brave, handsome, generous—

‘Either hold your tongue or go on with your story,’ cried the warrior king, in whose mind these remarks awakened disagreeable family recollections.

‘Hi! hi! hi!’ laughed the demon: ‘I will obey your majesty, and make Madan-manjari, the misanthropical jay, proceed.’

Yes, she loved the hunchback; and if it were wonderful is our love!’

Quoth the jay. ‘A light from heaven which rains happiness in this dull, dark earth! A spell falling upon the spirit, which reminds us of a higher existence! A memory of bliss! A present delight! An earnest of future felicity!’ It makes hidesomeness beautiful and stupidity clever, old age young and wickedness good, moroseness amiable, and low-mindedness magnanimous, per-versity strange and gallantry piquant.

Truly it is sovereign alchemy and excellent flux for blending contradictions is our love!’ exclaimed the jay.

And so saying, she cast a tri-uphant look at the parrot, who only remarked that he could have desired a little more originality in her remarks.

For some months (resumed Madan-manjari), the bride and the bridegroom lived happily together in Hemgupt’s house. But it is said:

Never yet did the tiger become a lamb; and the hunchback felt that the effect of his passions again wanted blunting. He reflected, ‘Wisdom is exemption from attachment and affection for children, wife, and home.’ Then he thus addressed my poor young mistress:

‘I have been now in thy country some years, and I have heard no tidings of my own family, hence my mind is sad. I have told thee everything about myself; thon must now ask thy mother leave for me to go to my own city, and, if thou wishest, thou mayst take me.’

Ratanwati lost no time in saying to her mother, ‘My husband wishes to visit his own country; will you so arrange that he may not be pained about this matter?’

The mother went to her husband, and said, ‘Your son-in-law desires leave to go to his own country!’

Hemgupt replied, ‘Very well; we will grant him leave. One has no power over another man’s son. We will do what he wishes.

The parents then called their daughter, and asked her to tell them her real desire—whether she would go to her father-in-law’s house, or would remain in her mother’s home. She was abashed at this question, and could not answer; but she went back to her husband, and said, ‘As my father and mother have declared that you should do as you like, do not leave me behind.’

Presently the merchant summoned his son-in-law, and having bestowed great wealth upon him, allowed him to depart. He also bade his daughter farewell, after giving her a panaquin and a female slave. And the parents took leave of them with weeping and bitter tears; their hearts were like to break. And so was mine.

For some days the hunchback travelled quietly along with his wife, in deep thought. He could not take her to his city, where she would find out his evil life, and the fraud which he had passed upon her father. Besides which, although he wanted her money, he by no means wanted her company for life. After turning on many projects in his evil-begotten mind, he hit upon the following:

He disguised the palanquin-bearers when halting at a little shed in the thick jungle through which they were travelling, and said to his wife, 'This is a place of danger; give me thy jewels, and I will hide them in my waist-sash.' When thou reachest the city thou canst wear them again.' She then gave up to him all her ornamens, which were of great value. Thereupon he inveigled the slave girl into the depths of the forest, where he murdered her, and left her body to be devoured by wild beasts. Lastly, returning to his poor mistress, he induced her to leave the hut with him, and pushed her by force into a dry well, after which he set out alone with his ill-gotten wealth, walking towards his own city.

In the meantime, a wayfaring man, who was passing through that jungle, hearing the sound of weeping, stood still, and began to say to himself, 'How came to my ears the voice of a mortal's grief in this wild wood?' He then followed the direction of the noise, which led him to a pit, and peeping over the side, he saw a woman crying at the bottom. The traveller at once loosened his girdle cloth, knotted it to his turban, and letting down the line pulled out the poor bride. He asked her who she was, and how she came to fall into that well. She replied, 'I am the daughter of Hemgupt, the wealthiest merchant in the city of Champaipur; and I was journeying with my husband to his own country, when robbers set upon us and surrounded us. They slew my slave girl, they threw me into a well, and having bound my husband they took him away, together with my jewels. I have no tidings of him, nor he of me.' And so saying, she burst into tears and lamentations.

The wayfaring man believed her tale, and conducted her to her husband, who gave the same account of the accident which had befallen her, ending with, 'Beyond this, I know not if they have killed my husband, or have let him go.' The father thus soothed her grief:

'Daughter! have no anxiety; thy husband is alive, and by the will of the Deity he will come to thee in a few days. Thieves take men's money, not their lives.' Then the parents presented her with ornamens more precious than those which she had lost; and summoning their relations and friends, they comforted her to the best of their power. And so did I.

The wicked hunchback had, meanwhile, returned to his own city, where he was excellently well received, because he brought much wealth with him. His old associates flocked around him rejoicing; and he fell into the same courses which had beggarred him before. Gambling and debauchery soon blunted his passions, and emptied his purse. Again his boon companions, finding him without a broken corvis, drove him from their doors; he stole, and was flogged for theft; and lastly, half famished, he fled the city. Then he said to himself, 'I must go to my father-in-law, and make the excuse that a grandson has been born to him, and that I have come to offer him congratulations on the event.'

Imagine, however, his fears and astonishment when, as he entered the house, his wife stood before him. At first he thought it was a ghost, and turned to run away, but she went out to him and said, 'Husband, be not troubled! I have told my father that thieves came upon us, and killed the slave girl and robbed me and threw me into a well, and bound thee and carried thee off. Tell the same story, and put away all anxious feelings. Come up and change thy tattered garments— alas! some misfortune hath befallen thee. But what crime had I, or my poor mistress, committed? A male is of the same disposition as a highway robber, and she who forms friendship with such a one only endures upon her bosom a black and venomous snake.'

'Sir Parrot,' said the jay, turning to her woer, 'I have spoken. I have nothing more to say but that you he-things are all a treacherous, selfish, wicked race, created for the express purpose of working our worldly woe, and—'

'When a female, O my king, asserts that she has nothing more to say, but,' broke in Churaman, the parrot, with a loud dogmatical voice, 'I know that what she has said gets her tongue for what she is about to say. This person has surely spoken long enough and drearily enough.'

'Tell me, then, O parrot,' said the king, 'what faults there may be in the other sex.'

'I will relate,' quoth Churaman, 'an occurrence which in my early youth determined me to live and to die an old bachelor.'

When quite a young bird and before my school days began, I was caught in the land of Malay and was sold to a very rich merchant named Sagaradati, a widower with one daughter, the lady Jayshri. As her father spent all his days and half his nights in counting-house, conning his ledgers and scolding his writers, that young woman had more liberty than is generally allowed to those of her age, and a mighty bad use she made of it.

'O king! men commit two capital mistakes in rearing the domestic calamity, and these are over-vigilance and under-vigilance. Some parents never lose sight of their daughters, suspect them of all evil intentions, and are silly enough to show their suspicions, which is an incentive to evil doing. For the weak-minded things do naturally say, ‘I will be wicked at once. What do I now but suffer all the pains and penalties of badness, without enjoying its pleasures?’ And so they are guilty of many evil actions; for however vigilant fathers and mothers may be, the daughter can always blind their eyes.

On the other hand many parents take no trouble whatever with their charges: they allow them to sit in idleness, the origin of badness, they permit them to communicate with the wicked, and they give them liberty which breeds opportunity. Thus they also, falling into the snare of the unrighteous, who are ever a more painstaking race than the righteous, are guilty of many evil actions.

What then, must wise parents do? The wise will study the characters of their children, and modify their treatment accordingly. If a daughter be naturally good she will be treated with a prudent confidence. If she be vicious an apparent trust will be reposed in her, but her father and mother will secretly ever be upon their guard.

The one idea—

‘All this parrot-prate, I suppose, is only intended to vex me,’ cried the warrior king, who always considered himself, and very naturally, a person of such consequence as always to be uppermost in the thoughts and minds of others. ‘If thou must tell a tale, then tell one, Vampire! or else be silent, as I am sick to the death of thy psychics.’ It is well, O warrior king! resumed Dait. After that Churram the parrot had given the young Raja Ram a golden mine full of good advice about the management of daughters, he proceeded to describe Jayashri.

She was tall, stout, and well made, of lymphatic temperament, and yet strong passions. Her fine large eyes had heavy and rather full eyelids, which are to be avoided. Her hands were symmetrical without being small, and the palms were ever warm and damp. Though her lips were good, her mouth was somewhat underhung, and her voice was so deep that at times it sounded like that of a man. Her hair was smooth as the kokila’s plume, and her complexion was that of the young jasmine; and these were the points at which most persons looked. Altogether she was neither handsome nor ugly, which is an excellent thing in woman. Sita the goddess was lovely to excess, therefore she was carried away by a demon. Raja Bali was exceedingly generous, and thus he emptied all his treasury. In this way exaggeration, even of good, is bad.

Yet must I confess, continued the parrot, that, as a rule, the beautiful woman is more vicious than the ugly. The former is often tempted, but her vanity and conceit enable her to resist, by the self-promise that she shall be tempted again and again. On the other hand, the ugly woman must tempt instead of being tempted, and she must yield, because her vanity and conceit are gratified by yielding, not by resisting.

‘Ho, there! I broke in the jay, contemplously. What woman cannot win the hearts of the silly things called men? Is it not said that a pig-faced female who dwells in Landanpur has a lover?’ I was about to remark, my king! said the parrot somewhat nettled, if the aged virgin had not interrupted me, that as ugly women are more vicious than handsome women, so they are more successful.

1 The beautiful wife of the demigod Rama Chandra.

1868] Tales of Indian Devity. 711

‘We love the pretty, we adore the plain,’ is a true saying amongst the worldly wise. And why do we adore the plain? Because they seem to think less of themselves than of us—a vital condition of adoration.

Jayashri made some conquests by the portion of good looks which she possessed, more by her impudence, and most by her father’s reputation for riches. She was truly shameless, and never allowed herself less than half a dozen admirers at the time. Her chief amusement was to appoint interviews with them successively, at intervals so short that she was obliged to hurry away one in order to make room for another. And when a lover happened to be jealous, or ventured in any way to criticize her arrangements, she replied at once by showing him the door. Answer unanswerable!

When Jayashri had reached the ripe age of thirteen, the son of a merchant, who was her father’s gossip and neighbour, returned home after a long sojourn in foreign lands, whither he had travelled in the search of wealth. The poor wretch, whose name, by the bye, was Shridati (Gift of Fortune), had loved her in his childhood; and he came back, as men are apt to do after absence from familiar scenes, painfally full of affection for house and home and all belonging to it. From his cousin, an old uncle to the snarling supernaturally beast of a watchdog, he viewed all with eyes of love and melting heart. He could not see that his idol was greatly changed, and noisive for the better; that her nose was broader and more club-like, her eyelids fatter and thicker, her under lip more prominent, her voice harsher, and her manner coarser. He did not notice that she was an adept in judging of men’s dress, and that she looked with admiration upon all swordsmen, especially upon those who fought on horses and elephants. The charm of memory, the curious faculty of making past time present, caused all he viewed to be enchanting to him.

Having obtained her father’s permission, Shridati applied for betrothal to Jayashri, who, with peculiar boldness, had resolved that no suitor should come to her through her parent. And she, after leading him on by all the compliments of which she was a mistress, refused to marry him, saying that she liked him as a friend, but would hate him as a husband.

You see, my king! there are three several states of feeling with which women regard their masters, and these are love, hate, and indifference. Of all, love is the weakest and the most transient, because the essentially unstable creatures naturally fall out of it as readily as they fall into it. Hate being a sister excitement will easily become, if man has wit enough to effect the change, love; and hate-love may perhaps last a little longer than love-love. Also, man has the occupation, the excitement, and the pleasure of bringing about the change. As regards the neutral state, that poet was not happy in his ideas who sang,

Wherein indifference appears, or scorn.

Then, man, despair: then, hapless lover, mourn!

For a man versed in the Lila Shastr\textsuperscript{1} can soon turn a woman’s indifference into hate, which I have shown is as easily permitted to love. In which predicament it is the old thing over again, and it ends in the pure A\textsuperscript{2} nomenity.

\textsuperscript{1} Of which these two birds, the jay or the parrot, had dipped deeper.

\textsuperscript{2} The old philosophers, believing in a ‘Sat’ (\textit{vibh} \textit{dev} \textit{deva}), postulated an A\textsuperscript{3} (\textit{vibh} \textit{dev} \textit{deva}) and made the latter the root of the former.

\textsuperscript{3} maharajah into human nature, mighty King Vikram? asked the Demon in a wheeling tone of voice.

The trap was this time set too openly, even for the royal personage to fall into it. He hurried on, calling to his son, and not answering a word. The Vampire therefore resumed the thread of his story at the place where he had broken it off.

Shridati was in despair when he heard the resolve of his idol. He thought of drowning himself, of throwing himself down from the summit of Mount Girnar, of becoming a religious beggar, in short, of a multitude of follies. But he refrained from all such heroic remedies for despair, having rightly judged when he became somewhat calmer, that they would not be likely to further his suit. He discovered that patience is a virtue, and he resolved impatiently enough to practise it. And by perseverance he succeeded. The worse for him! How vain are men to wish! How wise is the Deity who is deaf to their desires!

Jayashri, for potent reasons best known to herself, was married to Shridati six months after his return home. He was in raptures. He called himself the happiest man in existence. He thanked and sacrificed to the Durgavan for listening to his prayers. He recalled to mind with thrilling heart the long years which he had spent in hopeless exile from all that was dear to him; his sadness and anxiety, his hopes and joys, his toils and troubles, his loyal love and his vows to Heaven for the happiness of his idol, and for the furtherance of his fondest wishes.

For truly he loved her, continued the parrot, and there is something holy in such love. It becomes not only a faith, but the best of faiths—an abnegation of self—which emancipates the spirit from its straightest and earthiest bondage, the 'I;' the first step in the regions of heaven; a homage rendered through the creature to the Creator; a devotion solid, practical, ardent, not as worship mostly is, a cold and lifeless abstraction; a merging of human nature into one far nobler and higher, the spiritual existence of the world.

For perfect love is perfect happiness, and the only perfection of man; and what is a demon but a being without love? And what makes man's love truly divine, is the fact that it is bestowed upon such a thing as woman.

And now, Raja Vikram, said the Vampire, speaking in his proper person, I have given you Madan-Manjari the jay's and Churamani the parrot's definitions of the tender passion, or rather their descriptions of its effects. Kindly observe that I am far from accepting either one or the other. Love is, according to me, somewhat akin to mania, a temporary condition of selfishness, a transient confusion of identity. It enables man to predicate of others who are his other selves, that which is ashamed to say about his real self. I will suppose the beloved object to be ugly, stupid, vicious, perverse, selfish, low-minded, or the reverse; man finds it charming by the same rule that makes his faults and foibles dearer to us than all the virtues and good qualities of his neighbours. Ye call love a spell, an alchemy, a deity. Why? Because it defies self by gratifying all man's pride, man's vanity and man's conceit, under the mask of complete unegotism. Vikram is not in heaven when he is talking of himself? and, prithee, of what else consists all the talk of lovers?

It is astonishing that the warrior king allowed this speech to last as long as it did. He hated nothing so fiercely now that he was in middle age, as any long mention of the 'handicraft god.' Having vainly endeavoured to stop by angry murtherings the course of the Baital's eloquence, he stepped out so vigorously and so rudely shocked that invertebrate talker, that the latter once or twice even bit off the tip of his tongue. Then the Vampire became silent, and Vikram relapsed into a walk which allowed the tale to be resumed.

Jayashri immediately conceived a strong dislike for her husband, and simultaneously a fierce affection for a reprobate who before had been indifferent to her. The more lovingly Shridati beheld her, the more vexed and annoyed she was. When her friends spoke to her, she turned up her nose, raising her eyebrows (in token of displeasure), and remained silent. When her husband spoke words of affection to her, she found them disagreeable, and turned away her face, realism on the bed. Then he brought dresses and ornaments of various kinds and presented them to her, saying, 'Wear these.' Then she would become more angry, knit her brows, turn her face away, and in an audible whisper call him 'fool.' All day she stayed out of the house saying to her companions, 'Sisters, my youth is passing away, and I have not, up to the present time, tasted any of this world's pleasures.' Then she would ascend to the balcony, peer through the lattice, and see the reprobate going along who would say to her friend, 'Bring that person to me.' All night she tossed and turned from side to side, reflecting in her heart, 'I am puzzled in my mind what I shall say, and whither I shall go. I have forgotten sleep, hunger, and thirst; neither heat nor cold is refreshing to me.'

At last, unable any longer to support the separation from her reprobate, whom she adored, she resolved to fly with her paramour. On one occasion, when she thought that her husband was fast asleep, she rose up quietly, and leaving him, made her way fearlessly in the dark night to her lover's abode. A thief, who saw her on the way, thought to himself, 'Where can this woman, clothed in jewels, be going alone at midnight?' And thus she followed her unseen, and watched her.

When Jayashri reached the intended place she went into the house, and found her lover lying at the door. He was dead, having been stabbed by a footpad; but she, thinking that he had, according to custom, drunk intoxicating hemp, sat upon the floor, and raising his head, placed it tenderly in her lap. Then, burning with the fire of separation from him, she began to kiss his cheeks, and to fondle and caress him with the utmost freedom and affection.

By chance a Pisach (evil spirit) was seated in a large fig tree opposite the house, and it occurred to him, when beholding this scene, that he might amuse himself in a characteristic way. He therefore hopped down from his branch, vivified the body, and began to return the woman's caresses. But as Jayashri bent down to kiss his lips, he caught the end of her nose in his teeth, and bit it clean off. He then issued from the corpse, and returned to the branch where he had been sitting.

Jayashri was in despair. She did not, however, lose her presence of mind, but sat down and proceeded to take thought; and when she had matured her plan she arose,

---

1 In Western India, a place celebrated for suicides.
2 The Pipal or Ficus Religiosa, a favourite roosting place for fowls.
dyed with blood, and walked straight home to her husband’s house. On entering the room, she clapped her hand to her nose, and began to gnash her teeth, and shriek so violently, that all the members of the family were alarmed. The neighbours also collected in numbers at the door, and, as it was bolted inside, they broke it open and rushed in, carrying lights. There they saw the wife sitting upon the ground with her face mutilated, and the husband standing over her apparently trying to appease her.

‘O ignorant, criminal, shameless, pitiless wretch!’ cried the people, especially the women; ‘why hast thou cut off her nose, she not having offended in any way?’

Poor Shridati, seeing at once the trick which had been played upon him, thought to himself: ‘One should put no confidence in a changeable mind, a black serpent, or an armed enemy; and one should dread a woman’s doings. What cannot a poet describe? What is there that a saint (jogi, a religious beggar) does not know? What nonsense will not a drunken man talk? What limit is there to a woman’s guilt? True it is that the gods know nothing of the defects of a horse, of the thundering of clouds, of a woman’s deeds, or of a man’s future fortunes. How then can we know? He could do nothing but weep, and swear by the herb basil, by his cattle, by his grain, by a piece of gold, and by all that is holy, that he had not committed the crime.

In the meanwhile, the old merchant, Jayashri’s father, ran off, and laid a complaint before the kotwal (magistrate), and the footmen of the police office were immediately sent to apprehend the husband, and to carry him bound before the judge. The latter, after due examination, laid the affair before the king. An example happening to be necessary at the time, the king resolved to punish the offence with severity, and he summoned the husband and wife to the court.

When the merchant’s daughter was asked to give an account of what had happened, she pointed out the state of her nose, and said, ‘Maharaj! why inquire of me concerning what is so manifest?’ The king then turned to the husband, and bade him state his defence. He said, ‘I know nothing of it,’ and in the face of the strongest evidence he persisted in denying his guilt.

Thereupon the king, who had vainly threatened to cut off Shridati’s right hand, infuriated by his refusal to confess and to beg for mercy, exclaimed, ‘How must I punish such a wretch as thou art?’ The unfortunate man answered, ‘Whatever your majesty may consider that be pleased to do.’ Thereupon the king cried, ‘Away with him, and impale him;’ and the people, hearing the command, prepared to obey it.

Before Shridati had left the court, the footpad, who had been looking on, and who saw that an innocent man was about to be unjustly punished, raised a cry for justice, and, pushing through the crowd, resolved to make himself heard. He thus addressed the throne: ‘Great king, the cherishing of the good, and the punishment of the bad, is the invariable duty of kings.’ The ruler having caused him to approach, asked him who he was, and he replied boldly, ‘Maharaj! I am a thief, and this man is innocent, and his blood is about to be shed unjustly. Your majesty has not done what is right in this affair.’ Thereupon the king charged him to tell the truth according to his religion; and the thief related explicitly the whole circumstances, omitting, of course, the murder.

1 Great king! a common address.

‘Go ye,’ said the king to his messengers, ‘and look in the mouth of the woman’s lover who has fallen dead. If the nose be there found then has this thief-witness told the truth, and the husband is a guiltless man.’

The nose was presently produced in court, and Shridati escaped the stake. The king caused the wicked Jayashri’s face to be smeared with oily soot, and her head and eyebrows to be shaved; thus blackened and disfigured, she was mounted upon a little rugged-limbed ass and was led around the market and the streets, after which she was banished for ever from the city. The husband and the thief were then dismissed with betel and other gifts, together with much sage advice, which neither of them wanted.

‘My king,’ resumed the misogynous parrot, ‘of such excellences as these are women composed. It is said that “wet cloth will extinguish fire and bad food will destroy strength; a degenerate son ruins a family, and when a friend is in want he takes away life. But a woman is an infictor of grief in love and in hate, whatever she does turns out to be for our ill. Truly the Deity has created woman a strange being in this world.”’ And again, ‘The beauty of the nightingale is its song, science is the beauty of an ugly man, for giveness is the beauty of a devotee, and the beauty of a woman is virtue—but where shall we find it?’ And again, ‘Among the sages, Narudu; among the beasts, the jackal; among the birds, the crow; among men, the barber; and in this world woman—is the most crafty.’

‘What I have told thee, my king, I have seen with mine own eyes and I have heard with mine own ears. At the time I was young, but the event so shocked me that I have ever since held female kind to be a walking pest, a two-legged plague, whose mission on earth, like flies and other vermin, is only to prevent anything too happy. O, why do not children and young parrots sprout in cups from the ground?’

‘I was thinking, sire,’ said the young Dharma Dhream to the warrior king his father, ‘what woman would say of us if they could compose Sanskrit verses!’

‘Then keep your thoughts to yourself,’ replied the raja, nettled at his son daring to say a word in the presence of the king.

‘You always take the part of wickedness and depravity—’

‘Permit me, your majesty,’ interrupted the Baital, ‘to conclude my tale.’

When Madan-manjari, the jay, and Churaman, the parrot, had given these illustrations of their belief, they began to wrangle, and words ran high. The former insisted that females are the salt of the earth, speaking, I presume, figuratively. The latter went so far as to assert that the opposite sex have no souls, and that their brains are in a rudimentary and inchoate state of development. Thereupon he was tartly taken to task by his master’s bride, the beautiful Chandravatii, who told him that those only have a bad opinion of women who have associated with none but the vicious and the low, and that he should be ashamed to abuse feminine natures, because his mother had been one.

This was truly logical.

On the other hand the jay was sternly reproved for her mutinous and unreasonable assertions by the husband of her mistress, Raja Ram, who, although still a bridegroom, had not forgotten the gallant rule of his syntax—

The masculine is more worthy than the feminine; till Madan-manjari burst into tears and declared that her life was not worth having. And Raja Ram looked at her as if he could have wrung her neck.

In short, Raja Vikram, all the four lost their tempers, and with them what little wits they had. Two of them were but birds, and the others seem not to have been much better, being young, ignorant, inexperienced, and lately married. How then could they decide so difficult a question as that of the relative wickedness and villany of men and women? Had your majesty been there, the knot of uncertainty would soon have been undone by the trenchant edge of your wit and wisdom, your knowledge and experience. You have of course long since made up your mind upon the subject?

Dharma Dhwaj would have prevented his father's reply. But the youth had been twice reproved in the course of this tale, and he thought it wisest to let things take their own way.

'Women,' quoth the raja, oracularly, 'are worse than we are; a man, however depraved he may be, ever retains some notion of right and wrong, but a woman does not. She has no such regard whatever.'

'The beautiful Bangalah Rani for instance!' said the Baital, with a demonic snore.

At the mention of a word, the uttering of which was punishable by extirpation of the tongue, Raja Vikram's brain whirled with rage. He staggered in the violence of his passion, and putting forth both hands to break his fall, he dropped the bundle from his back. Then the Baital, disentangling himself and laughing lustily, ran off towards the tree as fast as his thin brown legs could carry him. But his activity availed him little.

The king puffs with fury followed him at the top of his speed, and caught him by his tail before he reached the sirus-tree, hurled him backwards with force, put foot upon his chest, and after shaking out the cloth rolled him up in it with extreme violence, bumped his back half a dozen times against the stony ground, and finally with a jerk threw him on his shoulder, as he had done before.

The young prince, afraid to accompany his father whilst he was pursuing the fiend, followed slowly in the rear, and did not join him for some minutes.

But when matters were in their normal state, the Vampire, who had endured with exemplary patience the penalty of his impudence, began in honeyed accents,

'Listen, O warrior king, whilst thy servant recounts unto thee another true tale.'

SYDNEY returned into Germany in the summer of 1574, having continued about a year in Italy; but though he yielded to Langueet's advice in giving up his intention of proceeding to Rome, he more than once reproached his friend for having made him forego a gratification which he so greatly desired. But Langueet had advised him wisely. At his age, and with his ignorance and nobleness of mind, he would have been in no little danger from the practised sophistry of the Romish logicians; and if he had not been circumvented by their arts, he might have been made the victim of their intolerance. Even the mere circumstance of having exposed himself to the seduction of that wily court would have injured him at home, where an unseasiness was already expressed because he had lived at Venice in what was thought a dangerous familiarity with persons of the papal religion. Walsingham intimated this to Langueet in a letter which arrived immediately after Sydney, having passed the winter with his excellent friend at Vienna, had set out on his return to England. Langueet replied to this in a manner which was intended not only to relieve Sydney's immediate friends from any such fear, but which might make Walsingham do away the suspicion in others. But he reminded Sydney that it behoved men who, like himself, were placed in a conspicuous rank of life, not only to keep themselves blameless, but as far as possible unsuspected also; wherefore he advised him to seek the company of Protestant clergy on his way, who were learned and wise men, and to attend their preaching both at Heidelberg (where he had provided him with an introduction to Ursinus) and at Strasburg, and on his way through France. He recommended him to cultivate the friendship of Walsingham, and by all means to preserve Cecil's good will; one easy and likely means was by being fond of his children, or at least appearing to be so; but he must remember that the astute and experienced old man would easily detect simulation in the young. This is the only reprehensible passage in Langueet's letters.

Sydney returned to his own country by way of Frankfort and Antwerp. His connections, aided by his personal accomplishments, soon made him so distinguished a person at Elizabeth's court, 'that it seemed (says Fuller) maimed without his company, he being a complete master of matter and language'; and even called him 'her Philip,' as if in proud or playful reference to her sister's royal husband.

There was an intention soon after his return of bringing about a marriage between him and Penelope, daughter of Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex. Between the two fathers there were some causes of disagreement, as were likely to arise by reason of the ill-will with which Essex and Leicester regarded each other; but both were honourable and upright men, and Edward Waterhouse, who had been employed by both, and appears to have been a person of great worth, brought them to a better understanding. With him the proposal for a connection which would have united their interests probably originated; and it was so well entertained, that Essex called Philip his son. But at this time Essex died; and some demurrer more than the
VIKRAM AND THE VAMPIRE; OR, TALES OF INDIAN DEVILRY.

ADAPTED BY

RICHARD F. BURTON,
Vice-President, Anthropological Society, London.

THE VAMPIRE'S FIRST STORY.

IN WHICH A MAN DECEIVES A WOMAN.

IN Benares once reigned a mighty prince, Pratapanukut by name, to whose eighth son Vajramukut happened the strangest adventure.

One morning the young man, accompanied by the son of his father's pradhan or prime minister, rode out hunting, and went to a great distance into the jungle. At last they unexpectedly came upon a beautiful 'tank' of a prodigious size. It was surrounded by short thick walls of fine baked brick; and flights and ramps of cut stone steps, half the length of each face, and adorned with turrets, pendants, and finials, led down to the water. The substantial plaster work and the masonry had fallen into disrepair, and from the crevices sprang huge trees, under whose thick shade the breeze blew freshly, and on whose banyan branches the birds sang sweeter; the grey squirrels chirruped joyously as they coursèd one another up the geared trunks, and from the pendent lilies the long-tailed monkeys were swinging sportively. The bountiful hand of Srawana had spread the earthen rampart with a carpet of the softest grass and many-hued wild flowers, in which were buzzing swarms of bees and myriads of bright-winged insects; and flocks of water-fowl, wild geese, Brahmini ducks, bit-terns, herons, and cranes, male and female, were feeding in the narrow strip of brilliant green that bordered the long deep pool, amongst the broad-leaved lotusese with the lovely blossoms, splashing in the pelucid waves, and baskmg happily in the genial sun.

The prince and his friend wandered when they saw the beautiful tank in the midst of a wild forest, and made many vain conjectures about it. They dismounted, tethered their horses, and threw their weapons upon the ground; then, having washed their hands and faces, they entered a shrine dedicated to Mahadeva, and there began to worship the presiding deity.

Whilst they were making their offerings, a bevy of maidens, accompanied by a crowd of female slaves, descended the opposite flight of steps. They stood there for a time, talking and laughing and looking about them to see if any alligators infested the waters. When convinced that the tank was safe, they divested themselves in order to bathe. It was truly a pleasant spectacle.

"Concerning which the less said the better," interrupted Raja Vikram in an offended tone. 4

"But it did not last long. The raja's daughter—for the principal maiden was a princess—soon left her companions, who were scooping up water with their palms and dashing it over one another's heads, and proceeded to perform the rites of purification, meditation, and worship. Then she began strolling with a friend under the shade of the small mango grove.

The prince also left his companion sitting in prayer, and walked forth into the forest. Suddenly the eyes of the raja's son and the raja's daughter met. She started back with a little scream. He was fascinated by her beauty, and began to say to himself, 'O thou vile Cupid, why lustest thou me?'

Hearing this, the maiden smiled encouragingly, but the poor youth, between palpitation of the heart and hesitation about what to say, was so confused that his tongue clave to his teeth. She raised her eyebrows a little. There is nothing which women despise in a man more than modesty, for mo—de—sy—

A violent shaking of the bag which hung behind Vikram's royal back broke off the end of this offensive sentence. And the warrior king did not cease that discipline till the Bhairul promised him more decorum in his observations.

Still the prince stood before her with downcast eyes and suffused cheeks: even the spur of contempt failed to arouse his energies. Then the maiden called to her friend, who was picking jasmine flowers so as not to witness the scene, and angrily asked why that strange man was allowed to stand and stare at her? The friend, in hot wrath, threatened to call the slaves, and to throw Vajramukut into the pond unless he instantly went away with his impudence. But as the prince was not so rude, and really had not heard a word of what had been said to him, the two women were obliged to make the first move.

As they almost reached the tank, the beautiful maiden turned her head to see what the poor modest youth was doing.

Vajramukut was formed in every way to catch a woman's eye. The raja's daughter therefore half forgave him his offence of modesty. Again she sweetly smiled, disclosing two rows of little opals. Then descending to the water's edge, she stooped down and plucked a lotus. This she worshipped; next she placed it in her hair, then she put it to her ear, then she bit it with her teeth, then she trod upon it with her foot, then she raised it up again, and lastly she stuck it in her bosom. 2 After which she mounted her conveyance and went home to her friends; whilst the prince, having become thoroughly desponding and drowned in grief at separation from her, returned to the minister's son.

"Females!" ejaculated the minister's son, speaking to himself in a careless tone, when his prayer finished, he left the temple, and sat down upon the tank steps to enjoy the breeze. He presently drew a roll of paper from under his waist-belt, and in a short time was engrossed with his study. The women, seeing this conduct, exerted themselves in every possible way of wile to attract his attention and to distract his soul. They succeeded only so far as to make him roll his head with a smile, and to remember that such is always the custom of man's bane; after which he turned over a fresh page of manuscript. And although he presently began to wonder what had become of the prince his master, he did not look up even once from his study.

1 A pond, natural or artificial; in the latter case often covering an extent of ten to twelve acres.
2 The Hindustani 'gilhari,' or little grey squirrel, whose twittering cry is often mistaken for a bird's.
3 The autumn or rather the rainy season personified, a hackneyed Hindu prosopopoeia.
4 Light conversation upon the subject of women is a personal offence to serious-minded Hindus.

Cupid in his two forms, Eros and Anteros.
This is true to life; in the east, women make the first advances, and men do the blundering.

882
He was a philosopher, that young man. But after all, Raja Vikram, what is mortal philosophy? Nothing but another name for indifference! Who was ever philosophical about a thing truly loved or really hated?—no one! Philosophy, says Shankaracharya, is either the gift of nature or the reward of study. But I, the Baital, the devil, ask you, what is a born philosopher save a man of cold desires? And what is a bred philosopher but a man who has survived his desires? A young philosopher—a cold-blooded youth! An elderly philosopher—a leucophaeitic old man! Much nonsense, of a verity, ye hear in praise of nothing from your rajahship's Nine Gems of Science, and from sundry other such wise fools.

Then the prince began to relate the state of his case, saying, 'O friend, I have seen a damsel, but whether she be a musician from Indra's heaven, a maiden of the sea, a daughter of the serpent kings, or the child of an earthly raja, I cannot say.'

'Describe her,' said the statesman in embassy.

'Her face,' quoth the prince, 'was that of the full moon, her hair like a swarm of bees hanging from the blossoms of the acacia, the corners of her eyes touched her ears, her lips were sweet with lupanambrosia, her waist was that of a lion, and her walk the walk of a king-goose. As a garment, she was white; as a season, the spring; as a flower, the jasmine; as a speaker, the kokila bird; as a perfum, musk; as a beauty, Kamadeva; and as being, Love. And if she does not come into my possession I will not live; this I have certainly determined upon.'

The young minister, who had heard his prince say the same thing more than once before, did not attach great importance to these awful words. He merely remarked that unless they mounted at once, night would surprise them in the forest. Then the two young men returned to their horses, and clad them in their bridle-rings, saddled them, and catching up their weapons, rode slowly towards the raja's palace. During the three hours of return hardly a word passed between the pair. Vajramukut not only avoided speaking; he never once replied till addressed thrice in the loudest voice.

The young minister put no more questions, 'for,' quoth he to himself, 'when the prince wants my counsel, he will apply for it.' In this point he had borrowed wisdom from his father, who held in peculiar horror the giving of unasked advice. So, when he saw that conversation was irksome to his master, he held his peace and meditated upon what he called his 'daythought.' It was his practice to choose every morning some tough food for reflection, and to chew the end of it in his mind at times when, without such employment, his wits would have gone wool-gathering. You may imagine, Raja Vikram, that with a few years of this head-work, the minister's son became a very crafty young person. After the second day the Prince Vajramukut, being restless from grief at separation, fretted himself into a fever. Having given up writing, reading, drinking, sleeping, the affairs entrusted to him by his father, and everything else, he sat down. He used constantly to paint the portrait of the beautiful lotus-gatherer, and to lie gazing upon it with tearful eyes; then he would stand up and tear it to pieces and beat his forehead, and begin another picture of a yet more beautiful face.

At last, as the pradhan's son had foreseen, he was summoned by the young raja, whom he found upon his bed, looking yellow and complaining bitterly of headache. Frequent discussions upon the subject of the tender passions that had passed between the two youths, and one of them had ever spoken of it so very disrespectfully that the other felt ashamed to introduce it. But when his friend, with a view to provoke communicativeness, advised a course of barks and bitter herbs and great attention to diet, quoting the hemistich attributed to the learned physician Charandatta—the unhappy Vajramukut's fortitude abandoned him; he burst into tears and exclaimed, 'Whosoever enters upon the path of love cannot survive it; and if (by chance) he should live, what is life to him but a prolongation of his misery?'

A fever stare but feed a cold,

'Yes,' replied the minister's son, 'the sage hath said—
The road of love is that which hath no beginning nor end;
Take thou heed of thyself, man! ere thou place foot upon it.'

And the wise, knowing that there are three things whose effect upon himself no man can foretell—namely, desire of woman, the dice-box, and the drinking of ardent spirits, find gladness in the three in the best of rules. Yet, after all, if there is no cow, we must milk the bull.'

The advice was, of course, excellent, but the hapless loon could not help thinking that on this occasion it came a little too late. However, after peace he returned to the subject and said, 'I have ventured to tread that dangerous way, be its end pain or pleasure, happiness or destruction.' He then hung down his head and sighed from the bottom of his heart, and begin another picture of a yet more beautiful face.

'She is the person who appeared to us at the tank?' asked the pradhan's son, moved to compassion by the state of his master.

The prince assented.

'O great king,' resumed the minister's son, 'at the time of going away she said anything to you? or had you said anything to her?'

'Nothing!' replied the other laconically, when he found his friend beginning to take an interest in the affair.

'Then,' said the minister's son, 'it will be exceedingly difficult to get possession of her.'

'Then,' repeated the raja's son, 'I am doomed to death; to an early and melancholy death!'

'Humph!' ejaculated the young statesman rather impatiently, 'did she make any sign, or give any hint? Let me know all that has happened: half confidences are worse than none.'

Upon which the prince related everything that took place by the side of the tank, bewailing the false shame which had made him dumb, and concluding with her pantomime.

The pradhan's son took thought for a while. He thereupon seized the opportunity of representing to his master all the evil effects of bashfulness when women are concerned, and advised him as he would be a happy lover, to brazen his countenance for the next interview.

Which the young raja faithfully promised to do.

'And now,' said the other, 'be comforted, O my master! I know her name and her dwelling-place. When she suddenly plucked the lotus flower and worshipped it, she thanked the gods for having blessed her with a sight of your beauty.'

Vajramukut smiled, the first time for the last month.

'When she applied it to her ear, it was as if she would have explained to thee, "I am a daughter of the Carnatic," and when she hit

---

1 Raja-hans, the Hindu equivalent for a swan or rather large grey geese.

1 Properly Karnatak; karna in Sanskrit means an ear.
Vikram and the Vampire; or, Tales of Indian Devilry.

1688]

it with her teeth, she meant to say that "My father is Raja Dantawat," who, by the bye, has been, is, and ever will be, a mortal foe to thy father.'

Vajramukut shooked. 'When she put it under her foot it meant, "My name is Padmavati."'

Vajramukut uttered a cry of joy.

'And when she placed it in her bosom, "You are truly dwelling in my heart" was meant to be understood.'

At these words the young raja started up full of new life, and after praising with enthusiasm the wondrous sagacity of his dear friend, begged him by some contrivance to obtain the permission of his parents, and to conduct him to her city. The minister's son easily got leave for Vajramukut to travel, under pretext that his body required change of scene, and his mind change of scenes. They both dressed and armed themselves for the journey, and having taken some jewels, mounted their horses and followed the road in that direction in which the princess had gone.

Arrived after some days at the capital of the Carnatic, the minister's son having disguised his master and himself in the garb of travelling traders, alighted and pitched his little tent upon a clear bit of ground in one of the suburbs. He then proceeded to inquire for a wise woman, wanting, he said, to have his fortune told. When the prince asked him what this meant, he replied that elderly dames who professionally predict the future are never above ministering to the present, and therefore that, in such circumstances, they are the pro-perest persons to be consulted.

'Is this a treatise upon the subject of immortality, devil?' echoed the King Vikram ferociously. The Baital declared that it was not, but that he must tell his story.

The person addressed pointed to an old woman who, seated before the door of her hut, was spinning at her wheel. Then the young men went up to her with polite salutations and said, 'Mother, we are travelling traders, and our stock is coming after us; we have come on in advance for the purpose of finding a place to live in. If you will give us a house, we will remain there and pay you highly.'

The old woman, who was a phyc-

nigmist as well as a fortune-teller, looked at the faces of the young men and liked them, because their brows were wide and their mouths denoted generosity. Having listened to their words, she took pity upon them and said kindly, 'This hovel is yours, my masters, remain here as long as you please.' Then she led them into her room, again welcomed them, lamented the poorness of her abode, and begged them to lie down and rest themselves.

After some interval of time the old woman came to them once more, and sitting down began to gossip. The minister's son upon this asked her, 'How is it with thy family, thy relatives, and connections; and what are the signs of subsistence?' She replied, 'My son is a favourite servant in the household of our great king Dantawat, and your slave is the wet-nurse of the Princes Padmavati, his eldest child. From the coming on of old age, she added, 'I dwell in this house, but the king provides for my eating and drinking. I go once a day to see the girl, who is a miracle of beauty and goodness, wit and accomplishments, and returning thence, I bear my own griefs at home.'

In a few days the young Vajramukut had, by his liberality, soft speech, and good looks, made such progress in nurse Lakshmi's affections that, by the advice of his companion, he ventured to broach the subject ever nearest his heart. He begged his hostess, when she went on the morrow to visit the charming Padmavati, that she would be kind enough to slip a bit of paper into the princess's hand.

'Son,' she replied, delighted with the proposal—and what old woman would not be?—there is no need for putting off so urgent an affair till the morrow. Get your paper ready, and I will immediately give it.'

Trembling with pleasure, the prince ran to find his friend, who was seated in the garden reading, as usual, and told him what the old nurse had engaged to do. He then began to debate about how he should write his letter to cull sentences and to weigh phrases; whether 'light of my eyes' was not too trite, and 'blood of my bow' rather too forcible. At this the minister's son smiled, and bade the prince not trouble his head with composition. He then drew his inkstand from his waist-shawl, nibbed a reed pen, and choosing a piece of pink and flowered paper, he wrote upon it a few lines. He then folded it, gummed it, sketched a lotus flower upon the outside, and handing it to the young prince, told him to give it to their hostess, and that all would be well.

The old woman took her staff in her hand and hobbled straight to the palace. Arrived there, she found the raja's daughter sitting alone in her apartment. The maiden, seeing her nurse, immediately arose, and making a respectful bow, led her to a seat and began the most affectionate inquiries. After giving her blessing and sitting for some time and chatting about indifferent matters, the nurse said, 'O daughter! in infancy I reared and nourished thee, now the Bhagwan (Deity) has rewarded me by giving thee stature, beauty, health, and goodness. My heart only longs to see the happiness of my womanhood, after which I shall depart in peace. I implore thee to read this paper, given to me by the handsomest and the proudest young man that my eyes have ever seen.'

The princess, glancing at the lotus on the outside of the note, slowly unfolded it and perused its contents, which were as follows:

1. She was to me the pearl that clings
   To sands deep hid from mortal sight,
   Yet fit for disdains of kings,
   The pure and lovely light.

2. She was to me the gleam of sun,
   That breaks the gloom of wintry day;
   One moment shine my soul upon,
   Then fled—how soon!—away.

3. She was to me the dreams of bliss
   That float the dying eyes before,
   For one short hour shed happiness,
   And fly to bliss no more.

4. O light, again upon me shine;
   O pearl, again delight my eyes;
   O dreams of bliss, again be mine!—
   Not earth may not be Paradise.

I must not forget to remark, parenthetically, that the minister's son, in order to make these lines generally useful, had provided them with a last stanza in triplicate.

'For lovers,' he said, 'are either in the optative mood, the desperate, or the exultative.' This time he had used the optative. For the despeperate he would substitute:

The joys of life lie dead, lie dead,
The light of day is quenched in gloom;
The spark of hope my heart hath fled—
What now withholdeth me from the tomb?

1. Meaning marriage, maternity, and so forth.

2. Sanskrit is a tooth.

3. Padma means a foot.

4. A common Hindu phrase equivalent to our 'I manage to get on.'
And this was the termination exultative, as he called it:

4. O joy! the pearl is mine again,
   Once more the day is bright and clear,
   And now 'tis real, then 'twas vain,
   My dream of bliss—O heaven is here!

The Princess Padmavati having permitted this doggerel with a contemptuous look, tore off the first word of the last line, and said to the nurse, angrily, 'Get thee gone, O mother of Yama, O fortunate creature, and take back this answer—giving her the scrap of paper, and the like bad verses. I wonder where he studied the humanities. Being gone, and never do such an action again!'

The old nurse, distressed at being thus treated, rose up and returned home. Vajramukut was too agitated to await her arrival, so he went to meet her on the way. Imagine his disappointment when she gave him the fatal word and repeated to him her ten fingers, not forgetting to describe a single look! He felt tempted to plunge his sword into his bosom; but Fortune interfered, and sent him to consult his confidant.

'Be not so hasty and desperate, my prince,' said the pradhan's son, seeing his wild grief; 'you have not understood her meaning. Later in life you will be aware of the fact that, in nine cases out of ten, a woman's "no" is a distinct "yes".

This morning's work has been good; the maiden asked where you learned the humanities, which being interpreted signifies "Who are you?"

On the next day the prince disclosed his rank to old Lakshmi, who naturally declared that she had always known it. The trust they reposed in her made her ready to address Padmavati once more on the forbidden subject. So she again went to the palace, and having lovingly greeted her nursing, said to her, 'The raja's son, whose heart thou dost so fascinate on the b rim of the tank, on the fifth day of the moon, in the light half of the month Yeth, has come to my house, and sends this message to thee:

1 Perform what you promised; we have now come;'
and I also tell thee that this prince is worthy of thee: just as thou art beautiful, so is he endowed with all good qualities of mind and body.'

When Padmavati heard this speech she shed great tears, and, rubbing sandal on her beautiful hands, she slapped the old woman's cheeks, and cried, 'Wretch, Daina (witch)! get out of my house; did I not forbid thee to talk such folly in my presence?'

The lover and the nurse were equally distressed at having taken the advice of the young minister, till he explained what the crafty dame meant. 'When she smeared the sandal on her ten fingers, I explained, and struck the old woman on the face, she signified that when the remaining ten moonlight nights shall have passed away she will meet you in the dark. At the same time he warned his master that to all appearances the lady Padmavati was far too clever to make a comfortable wife. The minister's son especially hated talented, intellectual, and strong-minded women: he had been heard to describe the torment of Naglok 3 as the compulsory companionship of a polheeq divine and a learned authoress, well stricken in years and of forbidding aspect, as such persons mostly are. Amongst womankind he admired— theoretically, as became a philosopher—the small, plump, laughing, chattering, unintellectual, and material-minded. And therefore—excuse the digres-

1 A form of abuse given to Dunga, who was the mother of Ganesha (Jnanas); the latter had an elephant's head.

1868] Tales of Indian Deviety. [May
As a conqueror, my prince! answered a low young man, if so be that you would be one. When you wish to win a woman, alway impone upon her. Tell her that you are her master and she will forthwith believe herself to be your servant. Inform her that she deserves you and forthwith she will adore you. Show her that you care nothing for her, and she will think of nothing but you. Prove to her by your demeanour that you consider her a slave, and she will become your parasite. But above all things—encourage me if I repeat myself too often—be aware of the fatal virtue which men call modesty and women sheepishness. Recollect the tale it has given us, and the danger which we have incurred; all this might have been managed at a tank within fifteen miles of your royal father’s palace. And allow me to say that you may still thank your stars; in love a lost opportunity is a gain. The scene was that of fairyland. Golden censers exalted the most costly perfumes, and gilded vases bore the most beautiful flowers; silver lamps containing fragrant oil illuminated the domed pavilions. The sense was that of fairyland. The scene was that of fairyland. Golden censers exalted the most costly perfumes, and gilded vases bore the most beautiful flowers; silver lamps containing fragrant oil illuminated the domed pavilions. The sense was that of fairyland.

Vajramukti, penetrated to the staircase, felt him grasp the veiled figure, who motioning him to tread lightly, led him quietly forward. They passed under several arches, through dim passages and dark doorways, till at last running up a flight of stone steps they reached the apartment of the princess.

Vajramukti was nearly fainting as the flood of splendour broke upon him. Recovering himself, he gazed around the room, and presently a tumult of delight invaded his soul, and his body bristled with joy! The scene was that of fairyland. Golden censers exalted the most costly perfumes, and gilded vases bore the most beautiful flowers; silver lamps containing fragrant oil illuminated the domed pavilions. The sense was that of fairyland.

Said the prince, who despite all efforts could not entirely shake off his unhappy habit of being modest, Those very delicate hands of yours are not fit to ply the pankhi. Why do you take so much trouble? I am cool and refreshed by the sight of you. Do give the fan to me and sit down.

Kakshiputra, with the most fascinating of smiles, said, You have taken so much trouble for my sake in coming here, it is right that I perform service for you.

Upon which her favourite slave, taking the pankhi from the hand of the princess, exclaimed, This is my duty. I will perform the service; do you too enjoy yourselves! The lovers then began to chew betel, which, by the bye, they disposed of in little agate boxes which they drew from their pockets, and they soon engaged in the tenderest conversation. Here the Balial paused for a while, probably to take breath. Then he resumed his tale as follows:

In the mean time, it became dawn; the princess concealed herself, and when she returned they again engaged in the same innocent pleasures. Thus day after day sped rapidly by. Imagine, if you can, the youth’s felicity; he was of an ardent temperament, deeply enamoured, barely a score of years old, and he had been strictly brought up by serious parents. He therefore resigned himself entirely to the sire for whom he willingly forgot the world, and he rejoiced in his good fortune, which had thrown in his way a conquest richer than all the mines of Mina. He could not sufficiently admire his Padmavati’s grace, beauty, bright wit, and numberless accomplishments.

Every morning for vanity’s sake, he learned from her a little useless knowledge in verse as well as prose, for instance, the saying of the poet—

Enjoy the present hour, ‘tis thine; be this, O man, thy law. Who e’er rose yesterday? Who the morrow foresaw?

And this highly philosophical axiom—

Eat, drink, and love—the rest is not worth a flipp.

‘By means of which he hoped, Raja Vikram’ said the Demon, not Unnatural pleasure, according to the Hindus, gives a brief elevation to the down of the body.

hearing his royal carrier's ' ugha ' and ' poohs ', to become in course of time almost as clever as his mistress.'

Padmavati, being as you have seen, a maiden of superior mind, was naturally more broken by her lover's dulness than by any other of his qualities; she adored it, it was such a contrast to herself. At first she did what many clever women do, she invested him with the brightness of her own imagination. Still water, she pondered, runs deep; certainly under this disguise must lurk a brilliant fancy, a penetrating but a mature and ready judgment—are they not written by nature's hand on that broad high brow? With such lovely mustache can he be aught but generous, noble-minded, magnanimous? Can such eyes belong to any but a hero? And she fed the delusion. She would smile upon him with intense fondness, when after every hour over a few lines of poetry, he would misplace all the adjectives and barbaramously entreat the metre. She laughed with gratification, when caught by the bright sayings that fell from her lips, the youth put forth some platitudes dim as the lamp in the expiring fire-fly. When he slipped in grammar she saw malice under it, when he retaliated a borrowed jest she called it a good one, and when he used—as princes sometimes will—bad language, she discovered in it a charming simplicity.

At first she suspected that the stratagem which had won her heart were the results of a deep-laid plot proceeding from her lover. But clever women are apt to be rarely sharp-sighted in every matter which concerns themselves. She frequently suspected that a third was in the secret. She therefore made no allusion to it. Before long the enamoured Vajramukut had told her everything, beginning with the distribute against love pronounced by the minister's son, and ending with his solemn warning that she, the pretty princess, would some day or other play her husband a foul trick.

' If I do not revenge myself upon him,' thought the beautiful Padmavati, smiling like an angel as she listened to the youth's confidence, 'may I become a gardener's ass in the next birth!'

Having thus registered a vow she broke silence and praised to the skies the young pradhan's wisdom and sagacity; professing herself ready from gratitude to become his slave, and only hoped that one day or other she might meet that true friend by whose skill her soul had been gratified in its dearest desire. ' Only,' she concluded, 'I am convinced that now my Vajramukut knows every corner of his little Padmavati's heart, he will never expect her to do anything but love, admire, adore and kiss him!' Then, suitting the action to the word, she convinced him that the young minister had for once been too crabbish and cynic in his philosophy.

But after the lapse of a month Vajramukut, who had eaten and drunk and slept a great deal too much, and who had not once hunted, became bilious in body and in mind melancholic. His face turned yellow, and so did the whites of his eyes; he yawned, as liver patients generally do, complained occasion-ally of sick headaches, and lost his appetite; he became restless and anxious, and once when alone at night he thus thought aloud: 'I have gone up country, there, home, and everything else, but the friend by means of whom this happiness was obtained I have not seen for the long length of thirty days. What will he say to himself, and how can I know what has happened to him?'

In this state of things he was sitting, and in the meantime the beautiful princess arrived. She saw through the matter and lost not a moment in entering upon it. She began by expressing her astonishment at her lover's sickness and fondness for change, and when he was ready to wax wrathful, and quoted the words of the sage. A lover's wife may be satisfied by another in the eighth year; she whose children all die, in the tenth; she who brings forth only daughters, in the eleventh; she who scolds, without delay, thinking that she alluded to his love, she smoothed his temper by explaining that she referred to his forgetting his friend. ' How is it possible, O my soul,' she asked with the softest of voices, 'that thou canst enjoy happiness here whilst thy heart is wandering there? Why didst thou conceal this from me, O astute? Was it for fear of distressing me? Think better of thy wife than to suppose that she would ever separate thee from one to whom we both owe so much!'

After this Padmavati advised, nay ordered, her lover to go forth that night, and not to return till his mind was quite at ease, and she begged him to take a few sweet-smelling and other trifles as a little token of her admiration and regard for the clever young man of whom she had heard so much.

Vajramukut embraced her with a transport of gratitude which so inflamed her anger that fearing lest the cloak of concealment might fall from her countenance, she went away hurriedly to find the greatest deceivers which her coeval boxes contained. Presently she returned carrying a bag of sweetmeats of every kind for her lover, and as he rose up to depart, she put into his hand a little parcel of sugar-plums especially intended for the friend; they were made up with her own delicate fingers, and they would please, she flattered herself, even his discriminating palate.

The young prince after enduring a number of farewell embraces and hopes for a speedy return, and last words ever beginning again, passed safely through the palace gate, and with a relieved aspect walked briskly to the house of the old nurse. Although it was midnight his friend was still sitting on his mat.

The two young men fell upon one another's bosoms and embraced affectionately. Then they began to talk of matters nearest their hearts. The raja's son wondered at seeing the jaded and haggard looks of his companion, who did not disguise that they were caused by his anxiety as to what might have happened to his friend. ' The hand of so talented and so superior a princess. Upon which Vajramukut, who now thought Padmavati an angel, and his late abode a heaven, remarked with formality—and two blunders to one quotation—that abilities properly directed win for a man the happiness of both worlds. The pradhan's son rolled his head.

' Again on your hobby-horse, nagging at talent whenever you find it in others!' cried the young prince, with a pun which would have delighted Padmavati. 'Surely you are jealous of her!' he resumed, anything but pleased with the dead silence that had received his joke; 'jealous of her cleverness, and of her love for me. She is the very best creature in the world. Even you, woman-hater as you are, would own it, if you only knew all the kind messages she sent, and the pleasant little surprise she has prepared for you. There! take and eat; they are made by her own dear hands!' cried the young raja, producing the sweetmeats. 'As she herself taught me to say—'

Thank God I am a man, Not a philosopher!'
Two Indian Divoey.

If your royal father say anything to you, refer him to what he himself does.'

Reassured by these words, Vajranmukt bade his friend a cordial good-night and sought his cot, and lay down to sleep; but he slept soundly, despite the emotions of the last few hours. The next day passed somewhat slowly. In the evening, when accompanying his master to the palace, the minister's son gave him the following directions:

'The princess draws with a tawdry dress; a woman of the house, of course, conceals that fact; why are you thus sad? Explain the cause to me.' Then she gave her an account of her cleverness, and when she had heard it she gave me permission to go and see you, and sent these sweetmeats for you; eat them and I shall be pleased.'

The young raja, being young, was in a gaudious tone of voice. 'When I love a woman I like to tell her everything—to know nothing from her—to consider her another self.'

Which habit, interrupted the prince's son, you will lose when you are a little older, when you recognize the fact that love is nothing but a bout, a game of skill between two individuals of opposite sexes: the one seeking to gain as much, and the other striving to lose as little, as possible; and that the sharper of the twain thus met on the chess-board must, in the long run, win. And reticence is but a habit. Practise it for a year and you will find it harder to betray than to conceal your thoughts. I hate its joys also. Is there no pleasure, think you, when suppress-inspected them, took up a sack and made signs to his master to follow him. Leaving the horses and baggage at the nurse's house, they walked to the burning-place outside of the city. The minister's son then buried his dress, together with that of the prince, and drew from the sack the costume of a religious ascetic: he assumed this himself, and gave to his companion that of a disciple. Then quoth the guru (spiritual preceptor) to his chela (pupil), 'Go, youth, to the bazaar, and sell these jewels, remembering to let half the jewellers in the place see the things, and if any one lay hold of thee, bring him to me.'

Upon which, as day had dawned, Vajramukti carried the princess's ornaments to the market, and entering the nearest goldsmith's shop, offered to sell them, and asked what they were worth. As your majesty well knows, gardeners, tailors, and goldsmiths are proverbially dishonest, and this man was no exception to the rule. He looked at the jewels, and wondered, because he had brought articles whose value he did not appear to know. A thought struck him that he might make a bargain which would fill his coffers, so he offered about the thousandth part of the price. This the pupil rejected, because he wished the affair to go further. Then the goldsmith, seeing him about to depart, sprang up and stood at the doorway, threatening to call the officers of justice if the young man refused to give up valuables which he said had been lately stolen from his shop. As the pupil only laughed at this, the goldsmith thought seriously of executing his threat, hesitating only because he knew that the officers of justice would gain more than he could by that proceeding. As he was still in doubt a shadow darkened his shop, and in entered the chief jeweller of the city. The moment the ornaments was shown to him he recognised them, and said, 'These jewels belong to Raja Dantawat's daughter; I know them well, as I sell them only a few months ago!' Then he turned to the disciple, who still held the valuables in his hand, and cried, 'Tell me truly, whence you received them?'

While they were thus talking, a crowd of ten or twenty persons had collected, and at length the report reached the superintendent of the archers. He sent a soldier to bring before him the pupil, the goldsmith, and the chief jeweller, together with the ornaments. And when all were in the hall of justice he looked at the jewels and said to the young man, 'Tell me truly, whence have you obtained these?'

'Spiritual preceptor,' said Vajramukti, pretending great fear, 'who is now worshipping in the cemetery outside the town, gave me these white stones with an order to sell them. How know I whence he obtained them? Dismiss me, my lord, for I am an innocent man.'

'Let the ascetic be sent for,' commanded the jeweller. Then, having taken both of them, along with the jewels, into the presence of King Dantawat, he related the whole circumstances.

'Master!' said the king on hearing the statement, 'whence have you obtained these jewels?'

The spiritual preceptor, before designing an answer, pulled from under his arm thehide of a black antelope, which he spread out and smoothed deliberately before using it as an assen. He then began to finger a rosary of beads each as large as an egg, and after spending nearly an hour in musing and in rolling the beads, he looked fixedly at the rajah, and replied:

'By Shiva! great king, they are mine own! On the fourteenth of the dark half of the moon at night, I had gone into a place where dead bodies are burned, for the purpose of accomplishing a witch's incantation. After long and toilsome labours, she appeared, but her demeanour was so unruled that I was forced to chastise her. I struck her with this, my trident, on the left leg, if memory serves me. As she continued to be refractory, in order to punish her I took off all her jewels and clothes, and told her to go where she pleased. Even this had little effect upon her—never have I looked upon so perverse a witch. In this way the jewels came into my possession.'

Raja Dantawat was stunned by these words. He begged the ascetic not to leave the palace for a while, and forthwith walked into the private apartments of the women. Happening to meet the queen, the dowager first, he said to her, 'Go, without losing a minute, O my mother, and look at Padmavati's left leg, and see if there is a mark or not, and what sort of mark!'

Presently she returned, and coming to the king said, 'Sou, I find thy ascetic lying upon her, bed, and complaining that she has met with an accident; and, indeed, Padmavati must be in great pain. I found that some sharp instrument with three points had wounded her. The girl says that a nail hurt her, but I never yet heard of a nail making three holes. However, we must all hasten, or there will be erysipelas, tumefaction, gangrene, mortification, amputation, and perhaps death in the house,' concluded the old queen, hurrying away in the pleasing anticipation of these ghastly consequences.

For a moment King Dantawat's heart was ready to break. But he was accustomed to master his feelings; he speedily applied the reins of reflection to the wild steed of passion. He thought to himself, 'the affairs of one's household, the intentions of one's heart, and whatever one's losses may be, should not be disclosed to any one. Since Padmavati is a witch, I am no longer my daughter. I will verily go forth and consult the spiritual preceptor.'

With these words the king went outside, where the guru was still sitting upon his black hide, making marks with his trident on the floor. Having requested that the pupil might be sent away, and having cleared the room, he said to the jorg, 'O holy man! what punishment for the heinous crime of witchcraft is awarded to a woman in the Dhharma-Sashtra?'

'Great king!' replied the devotee, 'in the Dhharma-Sashtra it is thus written: "If a Brahman, a cow, a woman, a child, or any other person whatsoever, who may be dependent on us, should be guilty of a pernicious act, their punishment is that they be banished the country.' However much they may deserve death, we must not spill their blood, as Lakshmi flies in horror from the deed.'

Hearing these words the raja dismissed the guru with many thanks and large presents. He waited till nightfall and then ordered a band of trustworthy men to seize Padmavati without alarming the household, and to carry her into a distant jungle full of tigers, leopards, and bears, and there to abandon her.

In the meantime, the ascetic and his pupil, hurrying to the cemetery, resumed their proper dresses; they then went to the old nurse's house, rewarded her hospitality till she went bitterly, girt on her weapons, and mounting their horses, followed the party which issued from the gate of King Dantawat's palace. And it may easily

---

1 The police magistrate, the Cudam of Camenoa.
2 The seat of a Hindu ascetic.
3 The Hindu scriptures.
4 The goddess of prosperity.

Vol. LXVII. No. CCCLXII. T T
be believed that they found little difficulty in persuading the poor girl to exchange her chance in the wild jungle for the prospect of becoming Vajramukut’s wife—lawfully wedded—but Benares. She did not even ask if she was to have a rival in the house,—a question which women, you know, never neglect to put under usual circumstances. After some days the two pilgrims of one love arrived at the house of their fathers, and to all, both great and small, excess in joy came.

"Now, Raja Vikram," said the Baital, ‘you have not spoken much; doubtless you are engrossed by the interest of a story wherein a man beats a woman at her own weapon—deceit. But I warn you that you will assuredly fall into Narate (the infernal regions) if you do not make up your mind upon and explain this matter. Who was the most to blame amongst these four? the lover,1 the lover’s friend, the girl, or the father?"

"For my part I think Padmavati was the worst, she being at the bottom of all their troubles," cried Dharma Dhwaj. The king said something about young people and the two senses of seeing and hearing, but his son’s sentiment was so sympathetic that he at once pardoned the interruption. At length, determined to do justice despite himself, Vikram said ‘Raja Dantawat is the person most at fault.’

"In what way was he at fault?" asked the Baital curiously.

1 In the original the lover is not blamed: this would be the Hindu view of the matter; we might be tempted to think of the old injunction not to see the kid in the mother’s milk.

King Vikram gave him this reply: ‘The Prince Vajramukut being tempted of the love-god was insane, and therefore not responsible for his actions. The minister’s son performed his master’s business obediently, without considering causes or asking questions—a very excellent quality in a dependant who is merely required to do as he is bid. With respect to the young woman, we are only to say that she was a young woman, and thereby of necessity a possible murderer. But the raja, a prince, a man of a certain age and experience, a father of eight! He ought never to have been deceived by so shallow a trick, nor should he, without reflection, have banished his daughter from the country.’

‘Gramercy to you!’ cried the Vampire, bursting into a discordant shout of laughter. ‘I now return to my tree. By my tail! I never yet heard a raja so readily condemn a raja.’

With these words he slipped out of the cloth, leaving it to hang empty over the great king’s shoulder.

Vikram stood for a moment, fixed to the spot with blank dismay. Presently, recovering himself, he retraced his steps, followed by his son, ascended the sivas-tree, tore down the Baital, packed him up as before, and again set out upon his way.

Soon afterwards a voice sounded behind the warrior king’s back, and began to tell another true story.
VIKRAM AND THE VAMPIRE; OR, TALES OF INDIAN DEVILRY.
ADAPTED BY
RICHARD F. BURTON,
Vice-President, Anthropological Society, London.

THE VAMPIRE'S THIRD STORY.
OF A HIGH-MINDED FAMILY.

In the venerable city of Bardawan, the O water for king! (quoth the Vampire) during the reign of the mighty Rupesn, flourished one Rajeshwar, a Rajput warrior of distinguished fame. By his valor and conduct he had risen from the lowest ranks of the army to command it as its captain. And arrived at that dignity he did not put a stop to all improvements, like other chiefs, who rejoice to rest and to return thanks; on the contrary, he became such a reformer that, to some extent, he remodelled the art of war.

Instead of attending to rules and regulations drawn up by pundits and Brahmans in their studies, he consulted chiefly his own experience and judgment. He threw aside the systematic plans of campaigns laid down in the Shastras (ancient books), and he acted upon the spur of the moment. He displayed a skill in the choice of ground, in the use of light troops, and in securing his own supplies whilst he cut off those of the enemy, which Karikaya himself, god of war, might have envied. Finding that the bows of his troops were clumsy and slow to use, he had them all changed before compelled to do by defeat; he also gave his attention to the sword-handles, which cramped the men’s grasp, but which, having been used for eighteen hundred years, were considered perfect weapons. And he organised a special corps of warriors using fire arrows, and he soon brought it to such perfection that, by using it against the elephants of his enemies, he gained many a campaign.

One instance of his superior judgment I am about to quote to thee, O Vikram, after which I return to my tale; for thou art truly a warrior king, very likely to imitate the innovations of the great general Rajeshwar.

A grant from the monarch was the result of the Vampire’s sner.

I resume. He found his master’s armies recruited from Northern Hindostan, and officered by kshatriya warriors, who grew great only because they grew old and sat flat. Thus energy and talent of the younger men were worse than wasted in troubles and disorders; whilst the seniors were often so ancient that they could not mount their chargers unaided, nor, when they were mounted, could they see anything a dozen yards before them. But they had served in a certain obsolete campaign, and until Rajeshwar gave them pensions and dismissals, they claimed a right to take first part in all campaigns present and future. The commander-in-chief refused to use any captain who could not stand steady on his legs or endure the sun for a whole day. When a soldier distinguished himself in action he raised him to the powers and privileges of the warrior caste. And whereas it had been the habit to lavish circles and bars of silver and other metals upon all those who had joined in the war, whether they had sat behind a heap of sand or had been foremost to attack the foe, he broke through the pernicious custom, and rendered the honour valuable by conferring it only upon the deserving. I need hardly say, that in an inordinately short space of time his army beat every king and general that opposed it.

One day the great commander-in-chief was seated in a certain room near the threshold of his gate, when the voices of a number of people outside were heard. Rajeshwar asked, ‘Who is at the door, and what is the meaning of the noise I hear?’ The porter replied, ‘It is a fine thing your honour has asked. Many persons coming at the door of the rich for the purpose of obtaining a livelihood and wealth. When they meet together they talk of various things: it is these very people who are now making this noise.’

Rajeshwar, on hearing this, remained silent.

In the meantime a traveller, a Rajput, by name Birbal, hoping to obtain employment, came from the southern quarter to the palace of the chief. The porter having listened to his story, made the circumstance known to his master, saying, ‘O chief! an armed man has arrived here, hoping to obtain employment, and is standing at the door. If I receive a command he shall be brought into your honour’s presence.’

‘Bring him in,’ cried the commander-in-chief.

The porter brought him in, and Rajeshwar inquired, ‘O Rajput, who and what art thou?’

Birbal submitted that he was a person of distinguished fame for the use of weapons, and that his name for fidelity and valour had gone forth to the uttermost end of Bharat-Kandha.1

The chief was well accustomed to this style of self-introduction, and its only effect upon his mind was a wish to shame the man by showing him that he had not the least knowledge of weapons. He therefore bade him bare his blade and perform some feat.

Birbal at once drew his good sword. Guessing the thoughts which were hovering about the chief’s mind, he put forth his left hand, extending it towards the front, and upwards, waved his blade like the arm of a windmill round his head, and, with a dexterous stroke, so shaved off a bit of nail that it fell to the ground, and not a drop of blood appeared upon his finger-tips.

‘Live for ever!’ exclaimed Rajeshwar in admiration. He then addressed to the recruit a few questions concerning the art of war, or rather concerning his peculiar views of it. To all of which Birbal answered with a spirit and a judgment which convinced the hearer that he was no common sowerder.

Whereupon Rajeshwar bore off the new man at arms to the palace of the king Rupesn, and recommended that he should be engaged without delay.

The king, being a man of few words and real ideas, after hearing his commander-in-chief, asked, ‘O Rajput, what shall I give thee for thy daily expenditure?’

‘Give me a thousand ounces of gold daily,’ said Birbal, ‘and then I shall have wherewithal to live on.’

‘Hast thou an army with thee?’ exclaimed the king in the greatest astonishment.

‘I have not,’ responded the Rajput somewhat stilly, ‘I have first, a wife; second, a son; third, a daughter; fourth, myself; there is no fifth person with me.’

All the people of the court on hearing this turned aside their heads to laugh, and even the women who were peeping at the scene, covered their mouths with their veils as they were dressed in black; the Rajput was then dismissed the presence.

1 India.
It is, however, noticeable amongst you humans, that the world often takes you at your own valuation. Set a high price upon yourselves, and each man shall have his neighbour, 'In this man there must be something.' Tell every one that you are brave, clever, generous, or even handsome, and after a time they will begin to believe you. And when you have attained success, it will be harder to convince them than it was to convince them. Thus—

'Listen not to him, sirrah,' cried Raja Vikram to Dharma-Dhwaj, the young prince, who had fallen a little way behind and was giving ear attentively to the Vampire's ethics. 'Listen to him not. And tell me, villain, with these ignoble principles of thine, what will become of modesty, humility, self-sacrifice, and a host of other good qualities (guna) which—what are they good qualities?'

'I know not,' rejoined the Baithal, 'neither do I care. But my habitually inspiring a success of human bodies has taught me one fact. The wise man knows himself, and is, therefore, neither unduly humble nor elated, because he had no more to do with making himself than with the cut of his cloth, or with the fitness of his loin-cloth. But the fool either loses his head by comparing himself with still greater fools, or is prostrated when he finds himself inferior to others and lesser fools. This shyness he calls modesty, humility, and so forth. Now, whenever entering a corpse, whether it be of man, woman, or child, I feel peculiarly modest. I know that my temperament only belongs to some conceited ass. And—'

'Wouldst thou have me bumble thy back against the ground?' asked Raja Vikram angrily.

The Baithal muttered some reply scarcely intelligible about his having this time stumbled upon a metaphysical thread of ideas, and then continued his story.

Now Rupen gave him unusual commands, for it is said, 'To try thy servant, bid him do things in season and out of season; if he obey thee willingly, know him to be useful; if he reply, dismiss him at once. Thus is a servant tried, even as a wife by the poverty of her husband, and brethren and friends by asking their own.'

In such manner, through desire of money, Birbal remained on guard all night; and whether eating, drinking, sleeping, sitting, going or wandering about, during the twenty-four hours, he held his master in watchful remembrance. This, indeed, is the custom; if a man sell another the latter is sold, but a servant by doing service sells himself, and when a man has become dependent, how can he be happy? Certainly it is that, however intelligent, clever, or learned a man may be, yet, while he is in his master's presence, he remains silent as a dumb man, and Struck with dread. Only while he is away from his lord, can he be at ease. Hence, learned men say that to do service aright, is harder than any religious study.

On one occasion it is related that there happened to be heard at night time the wailing of a woman in a neighbouring cemetery. The king on hearing it called out, 'Who is in waiting?'

'I am here,' replied Birbal, 'what command is there?'

'Go,' spoke the king, 'to the place where proceeds this sound of a woman crying, and having inquired the cause of her grief, return quickly.'

On receiving this order the Rajput went to obey it, and the king, unseen by him, and attired in a black dress, followed for the purpose of observing his courage.

Presently Birbal arrived at the cemetery. And what sees he there? A beautiful woman of a light yellow colour, loaded with jewels from head to foot, holding a horn in her right hand and a necklace in her left hand. Sometimes she danced, sometimes she jumped, and sometimes she ran about. There was not a tear in her eye, but beating her head and making lamentable cries, she kept dashing herself on the ground.

Seeing her condition and not recognising the goddess born of sea foam, and whom all the host of heaven loved, Birbal inquired, 'Why art thou thus beating thyself and crying out? Who art thou? And what grief is upon thee?'

'I am the Royal-Luck,' she replied.

'For what reason,' asked Birbal, 'art thou weeping?'

The goddess then began to relate her position to the Rajput. She said, with tears, 'In the king's palace low caste (Shudra) acts are done, and hence misfortune will certainly fall upon it, and I shall forsake it. After a month has passed the king, having endured excessive affliction, will die. In grief for this I weep. I have brought much happiness to the king's house, and hence I am full of regret that this my prediction cannot in any way prove untrue.'

'Is there,' asked Birbal, 'any remedy for this trouble, so that the king may be preserved and live a hundred years?'

'Yes,' said the goddess, 'there is. About eight miles to the east thou wilt find a temple dedicated to my terrible sister Devi. Offer to her thy son's head, cut off with thine own hand, and the reign of thy king shall endure for an age.' So saying Raj-Lakshmi disappeared.

Birbal answered not a word, but... with hurried steps he turned towards his home. The king still in black, as not to be seen, followed him closely and observed and listened to everything he did.

The Rajput was carried to his wife, awakened her, and related to her everything that had happened. The wise have said, 'she alone deserves the name of wife who always receives her husband with affectionate and submissive words. When she heard the circumstances she at once aroused her son, and her daughter also awoke. Then Birbal told them all that they must follow him to the temple of Devi in the wood.

On the way the Rajput said to his wife, 'If thou wilt give up thy son willingly, I will sacrifice him for our master's sake to Devi the Destroyer.'

She replied, 'Father and mother, son and daughter, brother and relative, have I now none. You are everything to me. It is written in the scripture that a wife is not made pure by gifts to priests, nor by performing religious rites; her virtue consists in sitting upon her husband, in obeying him and in loving him—yes! though be lame, maimed in the hands, dumb, deaf, blind, one-eyed, leprous, or humpbacked. It is a true saying that 'a son under one's authority, a body free from sickness, a desire to acquire knowledge, an intelligent friend, and an obedient wife; whoever holds these five things will find them bestowers of happiness and dispensers of affliction. An unwilling servant, a paragonious king, an insincere friend, and a wife not under control; these things are disturbers of ease and givers of trouble.'

Then the good wife turned to her son and said, 'Child, by the gift of thy head, the king's life may be spared, and the kingdom remain unshaken.'

'Mother,' replied that excellent youth, 'in my opinion we should hasten this matter. Firstly, I must obey your command; secondly, I must promote the interests of my master; thirdly, if this body be of any use to my lord, nothing better can be done with it in this world.'

('Excuse me, Raja Vikram,' said the Baiital, interrupting him, 'if I repeat these false discourses at full length; it is interesting to hear a person whose throat is about to be cut, talk so like a doctor of laws.)

Then the youth thus addressed his sire, 'Father, whoever can be of use to his master, the life of that man in this world has been lived to good purpose, and by reason of his usefulness he will be rewarded in other worlds.'

But his sister exclaimed, 'If a mother should give poison to her daughter, and sell her son, and a king seize the entire property of his subjects, when then could one look for protection?' But they headed her not, and continued talking as they journeyed towards the temple of Devi,—the king all the while secretly following them.

Presently they reached the temple, a single room, surrounded by a spacious paved area; in front was an immense building capable of seating hundreds of people. Before the image there were pools of blood, where victims had lately been slaughtered. Devi was in the sanctum, a large black figure with ten arms. With a spear in one of her right hands she pierced the giant Mahisha; and with one of her left hands she held the tail of a serpent, and the hair of the giant, whose breast the serpent was biting. Her other arms were all raised above her head, and were filled with different instruments of war, against her right leg leaned a lion. Then Birbal joined his hands in prayer, and thus addressed the awful goddess: 'O mother, let the king's life be prolonged for a thousand years by the sacrifice of my son. O Devi, mother! destroy, destroy his enemies! Kill! kill! Reduce them to ashes! Drive them away! Devour them! destroy them! Cut them in two! Drink, drink their blood! Destroy them root and branch! With thy thunderbolt, spear, scimitar, discus, or rope, annihilate them! Spheng! Spheng!'

The Rajput, having his son to kneel before the goddess, struck him so violent a blow that his head rolled upon the ground. He then threw the sword down, when his daughter, frantic with grief, snatched it up and struck her neck with such force that her head, separated from the body, fell. In her turn the mother, unable to survive the loss of her children, seized the weapon and succeeded in decapitating herself. Birbal, beholding all this slaughter, thus reflected: 'My children are dead; why now, should I remain in servitude, and upon whom shall I bestow the gold I receive from the king?' He then gave himself so deep a wound in the neck, that his head also separated from his body.

Rupsen, the king, seeing these four heads on the ground, said in his heart, 'For my sake has the family of Birbal been destroyed. Kingly power, for the sake of upholding which the destruction of a whole household is necessary, is a mere curse, and to carry on government in this manner is not just.' He then took up the sword and was about to slay himself, when this Destroying Goddess, probably satisfied with bloodshed, stayed his hand, bidding him at the same time ask any boon he pleased.

The genie, thus begged by the heaven-born, therefore, that his faithful servant might be restored to life, together with all his high-minded family, and the goddess Devi in the twinkling of an eye fetched from Patala, the regions below the earth, a vase full of Amrta, the water of immortality, sprinkled it upon the dead, and raised them all as before. After which the whole party walked leisurely home, and in due time the king divided his throne with his friend Birbal.

Having stopped for a moment, the Baiital proceeded to remark in a sententious tone, 'Happy the servant who grudges not his own life to save that of his master! And happy, thrice happy the master who can annihilate all greedy longing for life and worldly prosperity. Raja, I have to ask thee one searching question—Of these five, who was the greatest fool?'

'Demon!' exclaimed the great Vikram, all whose cherished feelings about fidelity and family affection, obedience and high-mindedness, were outraged by this Vampire view of the question, 'if thou meanest by the greatest fool the noblest mind, I reply without hesitating Rupsen, the king.'

'Why, pridhee?' asked the Baiital. 'Because, dull demon,' said the king, 'Birbal was bound to offer up his life for a master who treated him so generously; the son could not disobey his father, and the women naturally and instinctively killed themselves, because the example was set to them. But Rupsen the king gave up his throne for the sake of his retainer, and valued not a straw his life and his high inducements to live. For this reason I think him the most meritorious.'

'Surely, mighty Vikram,' laughed the Vampire, 'you will be tired of ever clamoring up on tall tree, even had you the legs and arms of Hanuman himself.'

And so saying he disappeared from the cloth, although it had been placed upon the ground. But the poor Baiital had little reason to congratulate himself on the success of his escape. In a short time he was again bundled into the cloth with the usual want of ceremony, and he revenged himself by telling another true story.

1 The Monkey God.

THE VAMPIRE’S FOURTH STORY.

OF A WOMAN WHO TOLD THE TRUTH.

"Listen, great king!" again began the Baital.

An unimportant baniya (trader) Hiranyakadit had a daughter, whose name was Madansena Sundari the Beautiful. Her face was like the moon; her hair like the clouds; her eyes like those of a musk-rat; her eyebrows like a bent bow; her nose like a parrot’s bill; her neck like that of a dove; her teeth like pomegranate grains; the red colour of her lips like that of a gourd; her waist lithe and bending like the pardi; her hands and feet like softest blossoms; her complexion like the jasmine—in fact, day by day the splendour of her youth increased.

When she had arrived at maturity her father and mother began often to revolve the subject of her marriage in their minds. And the people of all that country side ruled by Birbar king of Madanpur, bruit it abroad that in the house of Hiranyakadit had been born a daughter by whose beauty gods and men and sages were fascinated.

Thereupon many men, causing their portraits to be painted, sent them by messengers to Hiranyakadit to ask for her in marriage. But she was capricious, as beauties sometimes are, and when her father said, 'Make choice of a husband thyself,' she told him that none pleased her, and moreover she begged of him to find her a husband who possessed good looks, good qualities, and good sense.

At length when some days had passed, four suitors came from four different countries. The father told them that he must have from each some indication that he possessed the required good qualities, that he was satisfied with their looks, but that they must satisfy him about their knowledge.

The first said, 'I am acquainted with the Scriptures, have learnt many languages, and can read and write.'

The second exclaimed, 'My attainments are unique in the knowledge of archery. I am acquainted with the art of discharging arrows and killing anything which though not seen is heard, and my fine proportions are plainly visible to you.'

The third continued, 'I understand the language of land and water animals, of birds and of beasts, and have no equal in strength. Of my comeliness you yourselves may judge.'

'I have the knowledge,' quoth the fourth, 'how to make a certain cloth which can be sold for five rubies: having sold it I give the proceeds of one ruby to a Brahman, of the second I make an offering to a deity, a third I wear on my own person, a fourth I keep for my wife; and, having sold the fifth, I spend it in giving feasts. This is my knowledge and none other is acquainted with it. My good looks are apparent.'

The father hearing these speeches began to reflect, 'It is said that excess in anything is not good. Sita was very lovely but the demon Ravana carried her away, and Bali king of Mahabharat gave much alms but at length he was poor. My daughter is too fair to remain a maiden; to which of these shall I give her?'

So saying Hiranyakadit went to his daughter, explained the qualities of the suitors, and asked, 'To which shall I give her?' On hearing these words she was abashed, and hanging down her head, knew not what to reply.

Then the baniya reflected and said to himself, 'He who is acquainted with the Sutras is a Brahman, he who can shoot an arrow at the sound was a Kshatriya or warrior, and he who made the cloth was a Shudra or servile. But the youth who understands the language of birds is of our own caste. To him therefore will I marry her.' And accordingly he proceeded with the betrothal of his daughter.

Meanwhile Madansena went one day, during the spring season, into the garden for a stroll. It happened, just before she came out, that Somadatta, the son of the merchant Bharatkadit had gone for pleasure into the forest, and, being returning to his home through the same garden. He was fascinated at the sight of the maiden, and said to his friend, 'Brother, if I can obtain her my life will be prosperous, and if I do not obtain her my living in the world will be vain.'

Having thus spoken, and becoming restless from the fear of separation, he involuntarily drew near to her, and seizing her hand said—

'If thou wilt not form an affection for me, I will throw away my life on thy account.'

'Be pleased not to do this,' she replied; 'it will be sinful, and it will involve me in the guilt and punishment of shedding blood; hence I shall be miserable in this world and in the next.'

'Thy blandishments,' he replied, 'have pierced my heart, and the consuming thought of parting from thee has burnt up my body, and memory and understanding have been destroyed by this pain; and from excess of love I have no sense of right or wrong. But if thou wilt make me a promise, I will live again.'

She replied, 'Truly the iron age (Kali Yuga) has commenced since which time falsehood has increased in the world and truth has diminished; people talk smoothly with their tongues, but nourish deceit in their hearts; religion is destroyed, crime has increased, and the earth has begun to give little fruit. Kings levy fines, Brahmanas have waxed covetous, the son obeys not his sire's commands, brother distrusts brother; friendship has departed from amongst friends; sincerity has left masters; servants have given up service; man has abandoned modesty, and women have abandoned modesty. Five days hence, my marriage is to be; but if thou slay not thyself, I will visit thee first, and after that I will remain with my husband.'

Having given this promise and having sworn by the Ganges, she returned home. The merchant's son went his ways.

Presently the marriage ceremonies came on and Hiranyakadit the baniya expended a lack of rupees in feasts and presents to the bridgroom. The bodies of the twain were anointed with turmeric, the bride was made to hold in her hand the iron box for eye paint, and the youth a pair of betel scissors. During the night before the wedding, there was loud and shrill music, the heads and limbs of the young couple were rubbed with an oint-
Tales of Indian Divinity. 239

1668]

Vikram and the Vampire; or, 288

Vikram and the Vampire; or, [August

ment of oil, and the bridegroom's head was duly shaved. The wedding procession was very grand. The streets were ablaze with flaming torches carried in hand, fireworks were discharged as the people passed, elephants, camels, and horses richly caparisoned, were placed in convenient situations, and before the procession had reached the house of the bride half a dozen wicked boys and bad young men were killed or wounded. After the marriage formulas were repeated the kanyar gave a feast of suck and supper, and the food was so excellent that all sat down quietly, no one uttered a complaint, or brought dishonour on the bride's family, or cut with scissors the garments of his neighbour.

The ceremony thus happily concluded, the husband brought Madansena home to his own house. After some days the wife of her husband's youngest brother and also the wife of her eldest brother led her at night by force to her bridegroom, and seated her on a bed ornamented with flowers.

As her husband proceeded to take her hand, she jerked it away, and at once openly told him all that she had promised to Somdatt on condition of his not killing himself.

'All things,' rejoined the bridegroom, hearing her words, 'have their sense ascertained by speech; in speech they have their basis, and from speech they proceed; consequently a falsifier of speech fali泰山 everything. If truly you are desirous of going to him, go!'

Receiving her husband's permission she arose and went off to the young merchant's house in full dress. Upon the road a thief saw her, and in high good humour came up and asked:

'Whither goest thou at midnight in such darkness, having put on all these fine clothes and ornaments?' She replied that she was going to the house of her beloved.

'And where,' said the thief, 'is thy protector?'

'Kama Deva,' she replied, 'the beautiful youth with fiery arrows wounds with love the hearts of the inhabitants of the three worlds, Rati-pati, the husband of Rati, accompanied by the kokila bird, the humming bee and gentle breezes.' She then told to the thief the whole story, adding—

'Destroy not my jewels. I give thee a promise before I go that on my return thou shalt have all these ornaments.'

Hearing this the thief thought to himself that it would be useless now to destroy her jewels, when she had promised to give them to him presently of her own good will. He therefore let her go and sat down and thus soliloquised:

'To me it is astonishing that he who sustained me in my mother's womb should take no care of me now that I have been born and am able to enjoy the good things of this world. I know not whether he is asleep or dead. And I would rather swallow poison than ask man for money or favour. And these six things tend to lower a man—friendship with the perfidious, causeless laughter; alteration with women; serving an unworthy master, riding an ass, and speaking any language but Sanskrit. And these five things the deity writes on our fate at the hour of birth:—first, age; secondly, action; thirdly, wealth; fourthly, science; fifthly, fame. I have now done a good deed, and as long as a man's virtue is in the ascendant, his servants obey him. But when virtuous deeds diminish even his friends become incomical to him.'

Meanwhile Madansena had reached the place where Somdatt the young trader had fallen asleep.

She awoke him suddenly, and he springing up in alarm quickly asked her, 'Art thou the daughter of a deity? or of a saint? or of a serpent? Tell me truly, who art thou? And whence hast thou come?'

She replied, 'I am human,—Madansena, the daughter of the kanyar Hiranyakadatt. Dost thou not remember taking my hand in that grove, and declaring that thou wouldst slay thyself if I did not swear to visit thee first and after that remain with my husband?'

'Haast thou,' he inquired, 'told this to thy husband or not?'

She replied, 'I have told him everything; and he, thoroughly understanding the whole affair, gave me permission.'

'This matter,' exclaimed Somdatt in melancholy voice, 'is like pearls without a suitable dress, or food without clarified butter, or singing without melody; they are all alike unnatural. In the same way, unclean clothes will mar beauty, bad food will undermine strength, a bad wife will worry her husband to death, a disreputable son will ruin his family, an enraged demon will kill, and a woman, whether she love or hate, will be a source of pain. For there are few things which a woman will not do. She never brings to her tongue what is in her heart, she never speaks out what is on her tongue, and she never tells what she is doing. Truly the Deity has created woman a strange creature in this world.' He concluded with these words: 'Return thou home; with another man's wife I have no concern.'

Madansena rose and departed. On her way she met the thief, who, hearing her tale, gave her great praise, and let her go unharmed.

She then went to her husband, and related the whole matter to him. But he had ceased to love her, and he said, 'Neither a king nor a minister, nor a wife, nor a person's hair nor his nails look well out of their places. And the beauty of the kokila is its note, of a woman is her chastity, of an ugly man knowledge, and of a devotee forgiveness.'

The Vampire having narrated thus far, suddenly asked the king, 'Of these three, whose virtue was the greatest?'

Vikram, who had been greatly edified by the tale, forgot himself, and ejaculated, 'The thief's.'

'And pray why?' asked the Baital.

'Because,' the hero explained, 'when her husband saw that she loved another man, however purely, he ceased to feel affection for her. Somdatt let her go unharmed, for fear of being punished by the king. But there was no reason why the thief should fear the law and dismiss her; therefore he was the best.'

'Hi! hi! hi!' laughed the demon, spitefully. 'Here, then, ends my story.'

Upon which, escaping as before from the cloth in which he was clad behind the raja's back, the Baital disappeared through the darkness of the night, leaving father and son looking at each other in dismay.

---

1 The procession is fair game, and is often attacked in the dark with sticks and stones, causing serious disputes. At the supper the guests confer the obligation, and are exceedingly exacting.

2 Rati is the wife of Kama, the god of desire; and we explain the word by 'Spring personified.'

3 The Indian Cuckoo (Cuculus Indicus). It is supposed to lay its eggs in the nest of the crow.

---

1 This is the well known Ghi or Ghee, the one sauce of India, which is as badly off in that matter as England.

2 The European reader will observe that it is her purity which carries the heroine through all these perils.
Son Dharma Dhewaj,' quoth the great Vikram, 'the next time when that villain Vampire asks me a question, I allow thee to take the liberty of pinching my arm even before I have had time to answer his questions. In this way we shall never, of a truth, end our task.'

'Your words be upon my head, sire,' replied the young prince. But he expected no good from his father's new plan, as, arrived under the siras-tree, he heard the Baital laughing with all his might.

'Surely he is laughing at our beards, sire,' said the beardless prince, who hated to be laughed at like a young person.

'Let them laugh that win,' fiercely cried Raja Vikram, who hated to be laughed at like an elderly person.

The Vampire lost no time in opening a fresh story.

THE VAMPIRE'S FIFTH STORY.

Of the Thief who laughed and wept.

Your majesty (quoth the demon, with unusual politeness), there is a country called Malaya, on the western coast of the land of Bharat—yea see that I am particular in specifying the place—and in it was a city known as Chandrodaya, whose king was named Randhir.

This raja, like most others of his semi-difflid order, had been in youth what is called a sarvasarai (gay man); that is, he ate and drank and listened to music, and looked at dancers and made love much more than he studied, reflected, prayed, or conversed with the wise. After the age of thirty he began to reform, and he brought such zeal to the good cause, that in an incredibly short space of time he came to be accounted and quoted as the very paragon of correct raja. This was very praiseworthy. Many of Bramha's viseregent on earth, be it observed, have loved food and drink, and music and dancing, and the worship of Kama, to the end of their days.

Amongst his officers was Gunshankur, a magistrate of police, who, curious to say, was as honest as he was just. He administered equity with as much care before as after dinner; he took no bribes even in the matter of advancing his family; he was rather merciful than otherwise to the poor; and he never punished the rich ostentatiously, in order to display his and his laws' disrespect for persons. Besides which, when sitting on the carpet of justice, he did not, as some kowals do, use rough or angry language to those who cannot reply; nor did he take offence when none was intended.

All the people of the city Chandrodaya, in the province of Malaya, on the western coast of Bharat-land, loved and esteemed this excellent magistrate; which did not, however, prevent thefts being committed so frequently and so regularly, that no one felt his property secure. At last the merchants who had suffered most from these depredations, went in a body before Gunshankur, and said to him:

'O flower of the law! Robbers have exercised great tyranny upon us, so great indeed that we can no longer stay in this city.'

Then the magistrate replied, 'What has happened, has happened. But in future you shall be free from annoyance. I will make due preparation for these robbers.'

Thus saying Gunshankur called together his various delegates, and directed them to increase the number of their people. He pointed out to them how they should keep watch by night; besides which he ordered them to open registers of any arrival and departure, to make themselves acquainted by means of spies with the movements of every suspected person in the city, and to raise a body of paggi (trackers), who could follow the footsteps of thieves even when they were stealing shoes, till they came up with and arrested them. And lastly, he gave the patrols full power, whenever they might catch a robber in the act, to slay him without asking questions.

People in numbers began to mount guard throughout the city every night, but notwithstanding this, robberies continued to be committed. After a time all the merchants having again met together went before the magistrate, and said, 'O incarnation of justice! you have changed your officers, you have hired watchmen, and you have established patrols; nevertheless the thieves have not diminished, and plundering is ever taking place.'

Thereupon Gunshankur carried them to the palace and made them lay their petition at the feet of king Randhir. That raja having consoled them sent them home, saying, 'Be ye of good cheer. I will tonight adopt a new plan, which, with the blessing of the Bhagwan, shall free you from further anxiety.'

Observe, O Vikram, that Randhir was one of those concerning whom the poet sang—

The unwise run from one end to the other.

Not content with becoming highly respectable, correct, and even unimpeachable in point of character, he reformed even his reputation and did much more than he was required to do.

Then the pair, king and thief,

1. Literally 'one of all tastes'—a wild man, we should say.

When Canopus began to sparkle gaily in the southern skies, the king arose and prepared for a night's work. He disguised his face by smearing it with a certain paint, by twirling his mustachios up to his eyes, by parting his beard upon his chin, and conducting the two ends towards his ears, and by tightly tying a hair from a horse's tail over his nose, so as quite to change its shape. He then wrapped himself in a coarse outer garment, girt his loins, buckled on his sword, drew his shield upon his arm, and without saying a word to those within the palace, he went out into the streets alone and on foot.

It was dark, and Raja Randhir walked through the silent city for nearly an hour without meeting any one. As however he passed through a back street in the merchants' quarter, he saw what appeared to be a hairless dog lying at the foot of a house-wall. He approached it and up leaped a human figure, whilst a loud voice cried out, 'Who art thou?'

Randhir replied, 'I am a thief; who art thou?'

And I also am a thief,' rejoined the other, much pleased at hearing this; 'come then, and let us make together. But what art thou, a high-toper or a tally-prigger?'

'A little more ceremony between cows and the lorf,' whispered the king, speaking as a flash man, 'were not out of place. But look sharp, mind old Oliver, or the lambkin man will have the pull of us, and as sure as eggs is eggs we shall be scragged as soon as lagged.'

Well keep your red rag quiet,' grumbled the other, 'and let us be working.'
began work in right earnest. The gang seemed to swarm in the street. They were drinking spirits, slaying victims, rubbing their bodies with oil, daubing their eyes with lampblack, and repeating incantations to enable them to see in the darkness; others were practising the lessons of the god with the golden spear, and carrying out the four modes of breaking a house—picking out burnt bricks, cutting through unbaked ones when old, when softened by recent damp, by sprinkling water, and by exposure to the sun, or corroded by saline exudations and crusted over with salt; throwing water on a mud wall; and boring through one of wood. The sons of Skanda were making breaches in the shape of lotus blossoms, the sun, the new moon, the lake and the water jar, and they seemed to be anointed with magic unguents, so that no eye could behold, no weapon harm them.

At length having filled his bag with costly plunder, the thief said to the king, "Now, my rummy cove, we'll be off to the flash ken, where the lads and the mors are waiting to wot their whistles."

Randhir who as a king was perfectly familiar with 'thieves' Latin,' took heart and resolved to hunt out the secrets of the den. On the way, his companion, perfectly satisfied with the importance which he had attached to a rat-hole, and convinced that he was a true robber, taught him the whistles, the word, and the sign peculiar to the gang, and promised him that he should smack the lit that night before 'turning in.'

So saying the thief rapped twice at the city gate, which was at once opened to him, and preceding his accomplice led the way to a rock about two kos (four miles) distant from the walls. Before entering the dark forest at the foot of the eminence, the robber stood still and repeated incantations and descriptions of Patal-puri, the infernal city. Carpets of every kind, from the choicest tapestry to the coarsest rug, were spread upon the ground, and were strewn with bags, wallets, weapons, heaps of booty, drinking cups, and all the materials of debauchery.

Passing through this cave the thief led Randhir into another, which was full of thieves, preparing for the pleasures of the night. Some were changing garments, ragged and dirtied by creeping through gaps in the houses; others were washing the blood from their hands and feet; these combed out their long, dishevelled, dusty hair; those anointed their skins with perfumed cocoa-nut oil. There were all manner of murraders present, a villainous collection of Kartikeya's and Bhawani's crew. There were stables with their ponies hung to lanyards lashed round their naked waists, Dhaturiya-poisoners distinguished by the little bag slung under the left arm, and Phusigars wearing their fatal kerchiefs round their necks. Randhir had reason to thank the good deed in the last life that had sent him there in such strict disguise, for amongst the robbers he found, as might be expected, a number of his own people, spies and watchmen, guards and patrols.

The thief, whose importance of manner now showed him to be the chief of the gang, was greeted with applause as he entered the robbers room, where all make salaam to the new companion. A number of questions concerning the success of the night's work was quickly put and answered; then the company, having got ready for the revel, flocked into the first cave. There they sat down each in his own place and began to eat and drink and make merry.

After some hours the flaring torches began to burn out and drowsiness to overpower the strongest heads. Most of the robbers rolled themselves up in the rugs and, covering their heads, went to sleep. A few still sat with their backs to the wall, nodding drowsily or leaning on one side, and too stupefied with opium and hemp to make any exertion. At that moment a servant woman, whom the king saw for the first time, came into the cave and looking at him exclaimed, 'O raja! how can you with these wicked men? Do you run away from me or do you stay? or they will surely kill you when they awake.'

'I do not know the way; in which direction am I to go?' asked Randhir.

The woman then showed him the road. He threaded the confused mass of snorers, treading with the foot of a tiger-cat, found the ladder, raised the trap-door by exerting all his strength, and breathed once more the open air of heaven. And before plunging into the depths of the wood, he again marked the place where the entrance lay, and carefully replaced the bunch of grass.

Hardly had Raja Randhir returned to the palace, and removed the traces of his night's occupation, when he received a second deputation of the merchants, complaining bitterly and with the longest faces about their fresh misfortunes.

'O pearl of equity!' said the men of money, 'but yesterday you con-

---

1 This is the god Kartikeya, a mixture of Mars and Mercury, who revealed to a certain Yudhicharya the scriptures known as 'Chauriya-Vidyā'—Anglick, 'Thieves' Manual.' The classical robbers of the Hindu drama always carried according to its precepts. There is another work respected by thieves, and called the 'Chera-Vandahskas,' because consisting of fifty lines.

2 Supposed to be a good omen.

3 To share the booty.

4 Bhawani is one of the many forms of the destroying goddess, the wife of Shiva.

5 Wretches who kill with the narcotic seed of the stramonium.

6 Better known as 'Thugs,' which in India means simply 'razaas.'
and cramped with fatigue. They were so well matched in courage, strength and address, that neither obtained the least advantage, till the rajah, in hot pursuit, catching a stone slid from under him, and thus he fell to the ground at the mercy of his enemy. The thieves fled, and the rajah, throwing himself on his horse, tied his hands behind him, and brought him back to the city at the point of his good sword.

The next morning Randhir visited his prisoner, whom he caused to be bathed, washed, and covered with fine clothes. He then had him mounted on a camel and sent him on a circuit of the city, accompanied by a crier proclaiming aloud:

'Who hears! who hears! who hears! the king commands! This is the thief who has robbed and plundered the city of Candraodaya. Let all men therefore assemble themselves together this evening in the open space outside the gate leading towards the sea. And let them behold the penalty of evil deeds and learn to be wise.'

Randhir had condemned the thief to be crucified, nailed and tied with his hands and feet stretched out at full length, in an erect posture until death: everything he wished to eat was ordered to him in order to prolong life and misery. And when death should draw near, melted gold was to be poured down his throat till it should burst from his neck and other parts of his body. In the evening the thief was led out for execution, and by chance the procession passed close to the house of a wealthy landowner. He had a favourite daughter named Shobhini who was in the flower of her youth and very lovely: every day she improved and everyone who looked upon her grace and beauty. The girl had been carefully kept out of sight of mankind, never being allowed outside the high walls of the garden, because her nurse, a wise old woman, much trusted in the neighborhood, had at the hour of death given a solemn warning to her parents. The prediction was that the maiden should be the admiration of the city, and should die a Sati-widow before becoming a man's wife. From that hour Shobhini was kept as a pearl in its casket by her father, who had vowed never to survive her, and had even fixed upon the place and style of his suicide.

But the shaft of Fate strikes down the vulture sailing above the clouds, and follows the worm into the bowels of the earth, and pierces the fish at the bottom of the ocean—how then can mortal man expect to escape it? As the robber chief, mounted upon the camel, was passing to the cross under the old householder's window, a fire breaking out in the women's apartments, drove the inmates into the rooms looking upon the street.

The hum of many voices arose from the solid pavement of heads: 'This is the thief who has been robbing the whole city; let him tremble now, for Randhir will surely crucify him!' In beauty and bravery of bearing...
ing, as in strength and courage, no man in Chandrakant surpassed the robber, who, being magnificently dressed, looked, despite his disgraceful cavalcade, like the son of a king. He sat with an unmoved com-tenance, hardly hearing in his pride the scoffs of the mob; calm and steady when the whole city was frenzied with anxiety because of him. But as he heard the word 'tremble,' his lips quivered, his eyes flashed fire, and deep lines gathered between his eyebrows.

Shobhmani started with a scream from the casement behind which she had hid herself, gazing with an intense womanly curiosity into the thoroughfare. The robber's face was upon a level with, and not half dozens feet from, her pale cheeks.
She marked his handsome features, and his look of wrath made her quiver as if it had been a flash of lightning. Then she broke away from the fascination of his youth and beauty, and ran breathless to her father, saying:

'Go this moment and get that thief released!'

The old housekeeper replied:
'That thief has been pillaging and plundering the whole city, and by my means the king's archers were defeated; why, then, at my request, should our most gracious raja Randhir release him?'

Shobhmani, almost beside herself, exclaimed: 'If by giving up your whole property you can induce the raja to release him, then instantly so do; if he does not come to me, I must give up my life!

The maiden then covered her head with her veil, and sat down in the deepest despair, whilst her father, bearing her words, burst into a cry of grief, and hastened to present himself before the raja. He cried out:

'O great king, be pleased to receive four lakhs of rupees to release this thief.'

But the king replied: 'He has been robbing the whole city, and by reason of him my guards have been destroyed. I cannot by any means release him.'

Then the old householder finding, as he had expected, the raja in-exorable, and not to be moved, either by tears or bribes, or by the cruel fate of the girl, returned home with fire in his heart, and addressed her:

'Daughter, I have said and done all that is possible; but it avails me nothing with the king. Now, then, we die.'

In the mean time, the guards having led the thief all round the city; took him outside the gates and made him stand near the cross.
Then the messengers of death arived from the palace, and the excutioners began to nail his limbs.
He bore the agony with the forti-itude of the brave; but when he heard what had been done by the old householder's daughter, he raised his voice and wept bitterly, as though his heart had been bursting, and almost with the same breath he laughed heartily at a jest. All were startled by his merriment; coming as it did at a time when the iron was piercing his flesh, no man could see any reason for it.

When he died, Shobhmani, who was married to him in the spirit, recited to herself these sayings:

'There are thirty-five millions of hairstyles on this body. The woman who ascends the pile with her husband will remain so many years in heaven. As the snake-catcher draws the serpent from his hole, so she, rescuing her husband from hell, rejoices with him; and aye, though he may have sunk to a region of torment, be restrained in dreadful bonds, have reached the place of anguish, be exhausted of strength, and afflicted and tortured for his sins. No other effectual duty is known for virtuous women at any time after the death of their lords, except casting themselves into the same fire. As long as a woman, in her successive transmigrations, shall decide upon burning herself like a faithful wife, in the same fire with her deceased lord, so long shall she not be exempted from springing again to life in the body of some female animal.'

Therefore the beautiful Shobhmani, virgin and wife, resolved to burn herself, and make the next life of the thief certain. She showed her fervor by thrusting her finger into a torch flame till it became a cinder, and she solemnly bathed in the nearest stream.

A hole was dug in the ground, and upon a bed of green tree trunks were heaped hemp, pitch, faggots, and clarified butter, to form the funeral pyre. The dead body, anaointed, bathed, and dressed in new clothes, was then laid upon the heap, which was some two feet high.
Shobhmani prayed that as long as fourteen Indras reign, or as many years as there are hairs in her head, she might abide in heaven with her husband, and be waited upon by the heavenly dancers. She then presented her ornaments and little gifts of corn to her friends, tied twine round both wrists, put two new combs in her hair, painted her forehead, and tied up in the end of her body-cloth clean parched rice and cowrie-shells. These she gave to the bystanders, as she walked round the pyre, and put the heads of the end of the funeral pyre, upon which lay the body.
She then ascended the heap of wood, sat down upon it, and taking the thief's head in her lap, without sockets or levers or upper layer of faggots, she ordered the pile to be lighted. The crowd standing around set fire to it in several places, drummed their drums, blew their conchs, and raised a loud cry of 'Hari bu! Hari bu!' 2 Straw was thrown on, and pitch and clarified butter were freely poured out. But Shobhmani was a blessed easy death (Saha-marana): no part of her body was seen to move after the pyre was lighted—in fact, she seemed to die before the flame touched her.

By the blessing of his daughter's death, the old householder beheaded himself. 3 He caused an instrument to be made in the shape of a half-moon, with an edge like a razor, and fitting the back of his neck. At both ends of it, as at the beams of a balance, chains were fastened. He sat down with eyes closed; he was rubbed with the purifying clay of the holy river, Vaitarani; 4 and he repeated the proper incantations. Then putting his feet upon the extremities of the chains, he suddenly jerked up his neck, and his severed head rolled from his body upon the ground.

What a happy death was this!
The Baital was silent, as if meditaing on the fortunate transmigra-tion which the old householder had thus secured.

'But what could the thief have been laughing at, sire?' asked the young prince Dharma Dhwaj of his father.

'At the prodigious folly of the girl, my son,' replied the warrior king, thoughtfully.

'I am indebted once more to your Majesty,' burst out the Baital,

1 Properly speaking, the husbandman should plough with not less than four bullocks; but few can afford this. If he ploughs with a cow or a bullock, and not with a bull, the produce of his ground is unclean, and may not be used in any religious

2 A shout of triumph, like our 'Huzza!' and of course religious, meaning, 'Call upon

3 Although it is one of those recognised in India. So in Europe we read of 4 The river of Jagannath in Orissa; it shares the honours of sanctity with some 5 twenty-nine others, and in the lower regions it represents the classical Styx.

LANDS AND SEAS OF ANOTHER WORLD.

By R. A. Proctor, B.A., F.R.A.S.

Author of 'Saturn and its System,' &c. &c.

At a recent meeting of the Astronomical Society a globe was exhibited by Mr. Browning, one of the Fellows, on which lands and seas were depicted as upon an ordinary terrestrial globe. By far the larger part of these lands and seas were laid down as well-known entities, respecting which no more doubt is felt among astronomers than is felt by geographers respecting the oceans and continents of our own earth. Yet the world which is represented by Mr. Browning's globe is one which is never less than one hundred and twenty times farther from us than our own moon.

It is rather singular that the planet Mars—the orb which is represented by Mr. Browning's globe—is the only object in the whole heavens which is known to exhibit features resembling those of our earth. Astronomers have examined the moon in vain for such features: she presents an arid waste of extinct volcanoes, dreary mountain scenery surrounding lifeless plains (the seas of the old astronomers); an airless hemisphere of desolation, in fact, which has no counterpart on the terrestrial globe. The planets Jupiter and Saturn, orbs which far transcend our earth in mass and volume, which are adorned with magnificent systems of subsidiary bodies, and which seem in every respect worthy to be the abodes of nobler races than those which subsist upon our earth, afford no indications which justify us in asserting that they resemble the earth in any of those points which we are accustomed to regard as essential to the wants of living creatures. Nearly the whole of the light which we receive from these splendid orbs is reflected, not from their real surface, but from vaporous masses suspended in their atmospheres. It is indeed doubtful whether anything has ever been seen of the real surface of either planet, save perhaps that a small spot has here and there been faintly visible through the dense overhanging mantle of vapour. And strangely enough, the two small planets, which present in other respects the most marked contrast to the giant members of our system, resemble them in this point. Venus and Mercury seem both to be protected from the intense heat to which they would otherwise be exposed through their proximity to the sun, by densely vaporous envelopes, which only permit the true surface of the planets to be faintly seen, even under the most favourable conditions. The planet Mars, however, discloses to us her real surface, and this surface presents indications which cannot reasonably be doubted to result from the existence of continents and oceans, resembling those of our own earth in all essential features. Moreover, that wonderfully delicate instrument of research, the spectroscope, has confirmed these indications in a manner which hardly suffers any further doubt to rest upon their meaning. We do not think that our readers will find a brief record of the process of discovery which has culminated in the construction of Martian charts and globes, otherwise than interesting.

It does not appear that Galileo, when he applied to Mars the same telescope which had revealed to him the satellites of Jupiter, was able to detect any features of interest in the nearer planet. More than half a century, indeed, appears to have passed, after the invention of the
VIKRAM AND THE VAMPIRE; or, TALES OF INDIAN DEVILRY.

ADAPTED BY

RICHARD F. BURTON,

Vice-President, Anthropological Society, London.

THE VAMPIRE'S SIXTH STORY.

IN WHICH THREE MEN DISPUTE ABOUT A WOMAN.

On the lovely banks of Jamna's stream there was a city known as Daroshapahl—the Place of Duty; and therein dwelt a certain Brahman called Keshav. He was a very pious man, in the constant habit of performing penance and worship upon the ruin Sidi. He made his own clay images instead of buying them from others; he painted holy stones red at the top, and made to them offerings of flowers, fruit, water, sweetmeats, and fried peas. He had become a learned man somewhat late in life, having, until twenty years old, neglected his reading, and addicted himself to worshiping the beautiful youth Kama-deva and Rati his wife, accompanied by the cuckoo, the humming-bird, and sweet breezes.

One day his parents having rebuked him sharply for his ungovernable conduct, Keshav wandered to a neighbouring hamlet, and hid himself in the tall fir tree which shadowed a celebrated image of Panchanan. Presently an evil thought arose in his head: he defiled the god, and threw him into the nearest tank.

The next morning, when the person arrived whose livelihood depended on the image, he discovered that his god was gone! He returned into the village distracted, and all was soon in an uproar about the lost deity.

In the midst of this confusion the parents of Keshav arrived, seeking for their son; and a man in the crowd declared that he had seen a young man sitting in Panchanan's tree, but what was become of the god he knew not.

The runaways at length appeared, and the suspicions of the villagers fell upon him as the stealer of Panchanan. He confessed the fact, pointed out the place where he had thrown the stone, and added that he had polluted the god. All hands and eyes were raised in amazement at this atrocious crime, and every one present declared that Panchanan would certainly punish the daring insult by immediate death. Keshav was dreadfully frightened; he began to obey his parents from that very hour, and applied to his studies so sedulously that he soon became the most learned man of his country.

Now Keshav the Brahman had a daughter whose name was the Sweet Jasmine (Madhumalati). She was very beautiful. Whence did the gods procure the materials to form so exquisite a face? They took a portion of the most excellent part of the moon to form that beautiful face! Does any one seek a proof of this? Let him look at the empty places left in the moon. Her eyes resembled the full-blown blue nymphs; her arms the charming stalk of the lotus; her flowing tresses the thick darkness of night.

When this lovely person arrived at a marriageable age, her mother, father, and brother, all three became very anxious about her. For the wise have said, 'A daughter nille but without husband is ever a calamity hanging over a house.' And, 'Kings, women, and climbing plants love those who are near them.' Also, 'Who is there that has not suffered from the sex? for a woman cannot be kept in due subjection, either by gifts or kindness, or correct conduct, or the greatest services, or the laws of morality, or by the term of punishment, for she cannot discriminate between good and evil.'

It so happened that one day Keshav the Brahman went to the marriage of a certain customer of his, and his son repaired to the house of a spiritual predecessor in order to read. During their absence a young man came to the house, when the Sweet Jasmine's mother, inferring his good qualities from his good looks, said to him, 'I will give thee my daughter in marriage.' The father also promised his daughter to a Brahman youth whom he had set at the house of his employer; and the brother likewise had betrothed his sister to a fellow student at the house where he had gone to read.

After some days father and son came home, accompanied by these two suitors, and in the house a feast was already seated. The name of the first was Tribikram, of the second Baman, and of the third Madhusudan. The three were equal in mind and body, in knowledge, and in age.

Then the father, looking upon them, said to himself, 'Ho! there is one bride and three bridegrooms; to whom shall I give, and to whom shall I not give? We three have pledged our word to these three. A strange circumstance has occurred; what must we do?'

He then proposed to them a trial of wisdom, and made them agree that he who should quote the most excellent saying of the wise should become his daughter's husband.

Quoth Tribikram, 'Courage is tried in war; integrity in the payment of debt and interest; friendship in distress; and the faithfulness of a wife in the day of poverty.'

Baman proceeded: 'That woman is destitute of virtue who in her father's house is not in subjection, who wanders to feasts and amusements, who throws off her veil in the presence of men, who remains as a guest in the houses of strangers, who is much devoted to sleep, who drinks inebriating beverages, and who delights in distance from her husband.'

'Let none,' pursued Madhusudan, 'confide in the sea, nor in whatever has claws or horns, or who carries deadly weapons; neither in a woman, nor in a king.'

Whilst the Brahman was doubting which to prefer, and rather inclining to the latter sentiment, a serpent bit the beautiful girl, and in a few hours she died.

Stunned by this awful death, the father and the three suitors sat for a time motionless. They then arose, used great exertions, and brought all kinds of sorcerers, wise men and women who charm away poisons by incantations. These having seen the girl said: 'She cannot return to life.' The first declared, 'A person always dies who has been bitten by a snake on the fifth, sixth, eighth, ninth, and fourteenth days of the lunar month.' The second asserted, 'One who has been bitten on a Saturday or a Tuesday does not survive. The third opined, 'Poison infused during a certain six lunar mansions cannot be got under.'
Quoth the fourth, ‘One who has been bitten in any organ of sense, the lower lip, the cheek, the neck, or the stomach, cannot escape death.’ The fifth said, ‘In this case even Brahma, the Creator, could not restore life—of what account, then, are we? Do you perform the funeral rites; we will depart.’

Thus saying, the sorcerers went their way, and the mourning father took up his daughter’s corpse and caused it to be burnt, in the place where dead bodies are usually burnt, and burned to the fuel of total absolution.

After that the three young men said to one another, ‘We must now seek happiness elsewhere. And what better can we do than obey the words of Indra, the god of air, who spake thus?—“For a man who does not travel about there is no felicity, and a good man who stays at home is a bad man. Indra is the friend of him who travels. Travel! Travel!”’

The fortune of a man who sits, sits also; it rises when he rises; it sleeps when he sleeps; it moves well when he moves. Travel! Travel! Travel!

“A man who sleeps is like the Iron Age. A man who awakes is like the Bronze Age. A man who rises up is like the Silver Age. A man who travels is like the Golden Age. Travel!”

“Travel!”

“A traveller finds honey; a traveller finds sweet figs. Look at the happiness of the sun, who travels never tires. Travel!”

Before parting they divided the relics of the beloved one, and then they went their way.

Tribhakram, having separated and tied up the burnt bones, became a Yogi. In these days a powerful sect. He solemnly forewarned the eight great crimes, namely: eating at night; slaying any animal; eating the fruit of trees that give milk; or pumpkins or young bamboo; gathering honey; by theft; pleasuring the wealth of others; taking by force a married woman; eating flowers, butter, or cheese; and worshipping the gods of other religions. He learned that the highest act of virtue is to abstain from doing injury to sentient creatures; that crime does not justify the destruction of life; and that kings, as the administrators of criminal justice, are the greatest of sinners. He proffered the food of bhoga to the king, and bound the rishis with heavenly tokens from falsehood, eating flesh or fish, theft, drinking spirits, and marriage. He bound himself to possess nothing beyond a white loin-cloth, a towel to wipe the mouth, a beggar’s dish, and a brush of woolen threads to sweep the ground for fear of treading on insects. And he was ordered to1019 observe the austerities of the future state; the receiving from others more than the food of a day at once; all accidents; provisions, if connected with the destruction of animal life; death and disagree; also to please all, and to obtain compassion from all.

He attempted to banish his love. He said to himself, ‘Surely it was owing only to my pride and selfishness that I ever looked upon a woman as capable of affording happiness; and I thought, “Ah! ah! thine eyes roll about like the tail of the water wag-tail, thy lips resemble the ripe fruit, thy bosom is like the lotus beds, thy form is resplendent as gold molten in a crucible, the moon waves through desire to imitate the shadow of thy face, thou resembltest the pleasure-house of Cupid; the happiness of all time is concentrated in thee; a touch from thee would surely give life to a dead image; at thy approach a living admires thy beauty; by joy into a lifeless stone; obtaining thee I can face all the horrors of war; and were I pierced by showers of arrows, one glance of these would heal all my wounds.”

‘My mind is now averted from the world. Seeing her I say, “Is this the form by which men are bewitched? This is a basket covered with nettles; bones, flesh, blood, and impurities. The stupid creature who is captivated by this—is there a cannibal feeding in Currin a greater cannibal than he? These persons call a thing made up of impure matter and a face, and drink its charms as a drunkard swallows the inebriating liquor from his cup. The blind, infatuated beings! Why should I be pleased or displeased with this body, composed of flesh and blood? It is my duty to seek him who is the Lord of this body, and to disregard everything which gives rise either to pleasure or to pain.”

Baman, the second suitor, tied up a bundle of one’s beloved one’s ashes, and followed—somewhat prematurely—the precepts of the great lawgiver Manu. ‘When the father of a family perceives his muscles becoming flaccid, and his hair grey, and sees the child of his child, let him then take refuge in a forest. Let him take up his consecrated fire and all his domestic implements of making oblations to it, and, departing from the town to the lonely wood, let him dwell in it with complete power over the organs of sense and of action. With many sorts of pure food, such as holy sages used to eat, with green herbs, roots and fruit, let him perform the five great sacraments, introducing them with due ceremonies. Let him wear a thick antelope hide, or a vesture of bark; let him bathe evening and morning; let him suffer the hair of his head, his beard and his nails to grow continually. Let him slide backwards and forwards on the ground; or let him stand a whole day on tiptoe; or let him continue in motion, rising and sitting alternate1020ly; but at sunrise, at noon, and at sunset, let him go to the waters and bathe. In the hot season let him sit exposed to five fires, four blazing around him, with the sun above; in the rains, let him stand uncovered, without even a mantle and where the clouds pour the heaviest showers; in the cold season let him wear damp clothes, and let him increase by degrees the austerity of his devotions. Then, having repolished his holy holy, in the mind, let him live without external fire, without a mansion, wholly silent, feeding on roots and fruit.’

Meanwhile Madhusadan, the third, having taken a wallet and neckband, became a jogi (Yogi), and began to wander far and wide, living on nothing but chaff, and practising his devotions. In order to see Brahma he attended to the following duties: 1. Hearing; 2. Meditation; 3. Fixing the Deity in the Mind; 4. Absorbing the Mind. He combated the three evils, restless, injurious, voluptuous, by settling the Deity in his spirit, by subjecting his senses, and by destroying desire. Thus he would do away with the illusion (Maya) which conceals all true knowledge. He repeated the name of the Deity till it appeared to him in the form of a dry light or glory. Though connected with the affairs of life, that is, with affairs belonging to a body containing blood, bones, and impurities; to organs which are blind, palsied, and full of weakness and error; to a mind filled with thirst, hunger, sorrow, infatuation; to confirmed habits, and to the fruits of former births; still he strove not to view these things as realities. He made a companion of a dog, honouring it with his own food, so as the better to think on spirit. He practised all the five operations connected with the vital air, or air collected in the body. He attended much to pranayama, or the gradual suppression of breathing, and he secured fixedness of mind as follows. By placing his sight and thoughts on the tip of his nose he perceived smell; on the tip of his tongue he realised taste, on the root of his tongue he knew sound, and so forth. He practised the 84 postures (Asanas), raising his hand to the wonders of the heavens, till he felt no longer the inconveniences of heat or cold, hunger or thirst. He particularly preferred the padma, or lotus-posture, which consists of bringing the feet to the sides, holding the right in the left hand and the left in the right. In the work of suppressing his breath he permitted its respiration to reach to the utmost 12 fingers' breadth, and gradually diminished the distance from his nostrils till he could confine it to the length of 12 fingers from his nose, and even after restraining it for some time he would draw it to his greater distance from his heart. At such a time, he began by restraining inspiration for 26 seconds, and he enlarged this period gradually till he became perfect. He sat cross-legged, closing with his fingers all the avenues of respiration, and he practised pratyahara, or the power of restraining the members of the body and mind, with meditation and concentration, to which there are four enemies, viz. a sleepless heart, human passions, a confused mind, and attachment to anything but the one Brahman. He also cultivated yama, that is, offensiveness, truth, honesty, the forsaking of all evil in the world, and the refusal of gifts except for sacrifice, and nihama, i.e. purity relative to the use of water after defecation, pleasure in everything whether in prosperity or adversity, renouncing food when hungry, and keeping down the body. Thus delivered from these four enemies of the flesh, he resembled the unruffled flame of the lamp, and by Brama-gnana, or meditating on the Deity, placing his mind on the sun, moon, fire, or any other luminous body, or with his heart, or at the bottom of his throat, or in the centre of his skull, he was enabled to ascend from gross images of omnipotence to the works and the divine wisdom of the glorious original.

One day Madhusadan, the yogi, went to a certain house for food, and the householder having seen him began to say, 'Be so good as to take your food here this day!' The visitor sat down, and when the victuals were ready, he washed his feet and hands to be washed, and leading him to the Chunks, or square place upon which meals are served, seated him and sat by him. And he quoted the scripture: 'No guest must be dismissed in the evening by a housekeeper: he is sent by the returning sun, and whether he come in fit season or unseasonably, he must not be sent in the house without entertainment: let me not be the only one to eat food, without asking my guest to partake of it: the satisfaction of a guest will assuredly bring the housekeeper wealth, reputation, long life, and a place in heaven.'

The householder's wife then came to serve up the food, rice and split peas (Cajanus indicus), oil, and spices, all cooked in a new earthen pot with pine firewood. Part of the meal was served and the rest remained to be eaten, when the woman's little child began to cry aloud and to catch hold of its mother's dress. She endeavoured to release herself, but the boy would not let go, and the more she coaxed the more he cried, and was obstinate. On this the mother became angry, took up the boy and threw him upon the fire, which instantly burnt him to ashes.

Madhusadan, the yogi, seeing this, rose up about eating. The master of the house said to him, 'Why estest thou not?' He replied, 'I am aati, that is to say, to be entertained at your house, but how can one eat under the roof of a person who has committed such a deed?' Is it not said, 'He who does not govern his passions, lives in vain?' "A foolish king, a person puffed up with riches, and a weak child, desire that which cannot be procured. Also, A king destroys his enemies, even when flying; and the touch of an elephant, as well as the breath of a serpent, are fatal; but the wicked destroy even while laughing.'

Hereafter this, the householder smiled; presently he arose and went to another part of the tenement, and brought back with him a book, treating on the science of restoring the dead to life (Sanjinivinidya). This he had taken from its hidden place, two beams almost touching one another with the ends in the opposite wall. The precious volume was in single leaves, some six inches broad by treble that length, and the paper was stained with yellow ornament and the juice of tamarind seeds to keep away insects.

The householder opened the cloth containing the book, untied the flat boards at the top and bottom, and took out from it a charm. Having repeated this 'mantra,' with many ceremonies he at once restored the child to life, saying, 'Of all precious things, knowledge is the most valuable; other riches may be stolen, or diminished by expenditure, but knowledge is immortal, and, the greater the expenditure the greater the increase; it can be shared with none, and it defies the power of the thief.'

The yogi, seeing this marvel, took thought in his heart, 'If I could obtain that book, I would restore my beloved to life, and give up this course of uncomfortable postures and difficulty of breathing.' With this resolution he sat down to his food, and remained in the house.

At length night came, and after a time, all having had supper, and gone to their sleeping places, lay down. The yogi also went to rest in one part of the house, but did not allow sleep to close his eyes. When he thought that a fair part of the hours of darkness had sped, and that all were deep in slumber, then he got up very early, going into the room of the master of the house, and took the book from the beam ends and went his way.

Madhusadan, the yogi, went straight to the palace, in where the beautiful Sweet Jasmine had been burned. There he found his two rivals sitting talking together and comparing experiences. They recognised him at once, and cried aloud to him, 'Brother! thou also hadst been wandering over the world; tell us this—hast thou learned anything which can profit us?' He replied, 'I have learned the science of restoring the dead to life; upon which they both exclaimed, 'If thou hast really learned such knowledge, restore our beloved to life.'

Madhusadan proceeded to make his incantations, despite terrible sights in the air, the cries of jackals, owls, crows, cats, asps, vultures, dogs, and hounds, and the wrath of innumerable invisible beings, such as messengers of Yama (Pluto), ghosts, devils, demons, imps, fiends, devas, saccubi, and others. All the three lovers drawing blood from their own bodies offered it to the goddess Chandi, repeating the following incantation, 'Hail! supreme delusion! Hail! goddess of the universe! Hail! thou who fulfillst the desires of all. May I presume to offer thee the blood of my body; and wilt thou deign to accept it, and be propitious towards me?'

They then made a burnt-offering of their flesh, and each one prayed, 'Grant me, O goddess! to see the maiden alive again; I offer, by the fervency with which I present thee with mine own flesh, invoking Thee to be proportion to me. Salutation to thee again and again, under the mysterious syllable ang! ang!

Then they made a heap of the ashes and the bones, which had been carefully lost by Tribikram and Baman. As the jogi Madhusudan proceeded with his incantation, a white vapour arose from the ground, and, gradually condensing, assumed a perspicuous form—the fluid envelope of the soul. The three spectators felt their blood freeze as the bones and the ashes were gradually absorbed into the before shadowy shape, and they were restored to themselves only when the maiden Madhuvati begged to be taken home to her mother.

Then Kam, god of love, blinded them, and they began fiercely to quarrel about who should have the beautiful maid. Each wanted to be her sole master. Tribikram declared the bones to be the great fact of the incantation; Baman swore by the ashes; and Madhusudan laughed them both to scorn. No one could decide the dispute; the wisest doctors were all nonsensical; and as for the raja—well! we do not go for wit or wisdom to kings. I wonder if the great Raja Vikram could decide which person the woman belonged to?

To Baman, the man who kept her ashes, fellow! exclaimed the hero, not a little offended by the free remarks of the fiend.

‘Yet,’ rejoined the Baital impudently, ‘if Tribikram had not preserved her bones how could she have been restored to life? And if Madhusudan had not learned the science of restoring the dead to life how could she have been revivified? At least, so it seems to me. But perhaps your royal wisdom may explain.’

‘Devil!’ said the king angrily, ‘Tribikram, who preserved her bones, by that act placed himself in the position of her son; therefore he could not marry her. Madhusudan, who, restoring her to life, gave her life, was evidently a father to her; he could not, then, become her husband. Therefore she was the wife of Baman, who had collected her ashes.’

‘I am happy to see, O king,’ exclaimed the Vampire, ‘that, in spite of my presentiments, we are not to part company just yet. These little trips I hold to be, like lovers’ quarrels, the prelude to closer union. With your leave we will still practise a little suspension.’

And so saying, the Baital again ascended the tree, and was suspended there.

‘Would it not be better,’ thought the monarch, after recapturing and shouldering the fugitive, ‘for me to sit down this time and listen to the fellow’s story? Perhaps the double exercise of walking and thinking confuses me.’

With this idea Vikram placed his bundle upon the ground, well tied up with turban and waistband; then he seated himself cross-legged before it, and bade his son do the same.

The Vampire strongly objected to this measure, as it was contrary, he asserted, to the covenant between him and the raja. Vikram replied by citing the very words of the agreement, proving that there was no allusion to walking or sitting.

Then the Baital became sulky, and swore that he would not utter another word. But he, too, was bound by the chain of destiny. Presently he opened his lips, with the normal prelude that he was about to tell a true tale.

---

The Vampire’s Seventh Story.

Telling the Exceeding Folly of Many Wise Fools.

---

The Baital resumed.

Of all the learned Brahmanas in the learnedest university of Gaur (Bengal) none was so celebrated as Vishnu Swami. He could write verse as well as prose in dead languages, not very correctly, but still, better than all his fellows—which constituted him a distinguished writer. He had history, thesopcy, and the four Vedas or Scriptures at his fingers’ ends; he was skilled in the arcane science of Nyasa or Disputation, his mind was a mine of Paranic or osmogonico-traditional lore, handed down from the ancient fathers to the modern fathers: and he had written bulky commentaries, exhausting all that tongue of man has to say, upon the obscure text of some old philosopher whose works upon ethics, poetry and rhetoric were supposed by the sages of Gaur to contain the germs of everything knowable. His fame went over all the country; yes, from country to country. He was a sea of excellent qualities, the father and mother of Brahmanas, cows and women, and the humblest persons, courtiers and councillors. As a benefactor he was equal to Karna, most liberal of heroes. In regard to truth he was equal to the tenacious king Yudhishthira.

True, he was sometimes at a loss to spell a common word in his mother tongue, and whilst he knew to a fingerbreadth how many palms and paces the sun, the moon and all the stars are distant from the earth, he would be puzzled to tell you where the region called Yavana lies. Whilst he could enumerate, in strict chronological succession, every important event that happened five or six million years before he was born, he was profoundly ignorant of those that occurred in his own day. And once he asked a friend seriously, if a cat let loose in the jungle would not in time become a tiger?

Yet did all the members of alma mater Kasi, pandits as well as students, look with awe upon Vishnu Swami’s livid cheeks, and lack-lustre eyes, grimed hands and soiled cloths.

Now it so happened that this wise and pious Brahmanic peer had four sons whom he brought up in the strictest and most serious way. They were taught to repeat their prayers long before they understood a word of them, and when they reached the age of three they had read a variety of hymns and spiritual songs. Then they were set to learn by heart precepts that incalculable sacred duties, and arguments relating to theology, abstract and concrete.

Their father, who was also their tutor, sedulously cultivated, as all that thinking and advising their pupils upon education, advise, their implicit obedience, humble respect, warm attachment, and the virtues and sentiments generally. He praised them secretly and reproached them openly, to exercise their humility. He dressed them coarsely, to preserve them from vanity and conceit. Whenever they anticipated a ‘treat,’ he punctually disappointed them, to teach them self-denial. Often when he had promised them a present, he would revoke, not break his word, in order that discipline might have a name and habitat in his household. And knowing by experience how much stronger than love is fear, he frequently threatened, browbeat and overawed them with the rod and the tongue, with the terrors of this world, and with the horrors of the next, that they might be kept in

---

1 The land of Greece.
2 Savans, professors. So in the old saying, 'Hants, Pundit Sansara.—Alas! the world is learned!' This a little antedates the well known schoolmaster.
3 Children are commonly sent to school at the age of five. Girls are not taught to read, under the common idea that they will become widows if they do.
the right way by dread of falling into the bottomless pits that bound it on both sides.

At the age of six they were transferred to the Chatushpati, or school. Every morning the teachers and his pupils assembled in the hall where the different classes were called up by turns. They laboured till noon, and were allowed only two hours, half the usual time, for bathing, eating, sleep, and worship, which took up half the period. At 3 p.m. they resumed their labours, repeating to the tutor what they had learned by heart, and listening to the meaning of it: this lasted till twilight. They then worshipped, ate and drank for an hour; after this came a return of study, repeating the day's lessons, till 10 p.m.

In their rare days of ease—for the learned priest, mindful of the words of the wise, did not wish to dull them by everlasting work—they were enjoined to disjoint themselves with the gravity and the decorum that befit young Sandita, not to engage in light frolicks, not to use free jests or light expressions, not to draw pictures on the walls, not to eat honey, flesh, and sweet substances turned acid, not to talk to little girls at the well-side, or on no account to wear sandals, carry an umbrella, or handle a die even for love, and by no means to steal their neighbours' mangoes.

As they advanced in years their attention during work time was unremittingly directed to the Vedas. Worldly studies were almost excluded, or to speak more correctly, whenever worldly studies were brought upon the carpet, they were so evil entreated, that they well nigh lost all form and feature. History became 'The Annals of India on Brahminical Principles,' opposed to the Buddhistical; geography 'The Lands of the Vedas,' none other being deemed worthy of notice; and law, 'The Institutes of Mann,' then almost obsolete, despite their exceeding sanctity.

But Jatu-harinī had evidently changed these children before they were born; and Shani must have been in the ninth mansion when they came to light. Each youth as he attained the mature age of twelve was formally entered at the University of Kasi, where without loss of time, the first became a gambler, the second a confirmed libertine, the third a thief, and the fourth a high Buddhist, or in other words an utter atheist.

Here King Vikram frowned at his son, a hint that he had better not behave himself as the children of highly moral and religious parents usually do. The young prince understood him, and briefly remarking that such things were common in distinguished Brahman families, asked the Raja what he meant by the word 'Atheist.'

Of a truth (answered the Vampire) it is most difficult to explain. The sages assign to it three or four several meanings: first, one who denies that the gods exist but denies that they busy themselves with human affairs; and thirdly, one who believes in the gods and in their providence, but also believes that they are easily to be set aside. Similarly some atheists derive all things from dead and unintelligent matter; others from matter living and energetic but without sense or will; others from matter with forms and qualities generable and conceivable; and others from a plastic and methodical nature. Thus the Vishnu Swamis of the world have invested the subject with metaphysical tenets. The simple, that is to say, the mass of mortality, have confounded the confusion by reproachfully applying the word to those whose opinions differ materially from their own.

But I am at present, perhaps happily for myself, a Vampire, and having, just now, none of these human or inhuman ideas, mean simply to say that the priest's son's four sons are great at second sight and second as a principle of first causes, adopted, to their fullest extent, the doctrines of the philosophical Panditás. Nothing according to him exists but the five elements, earth, water, fire, air (or wind), and vacuum, and from the last proceeded the penultimate and so forth. With the sage Patanjali, he held the universe to have the power of perpetual progression. He called mātra (matter), which is an eternal essence, and the principle of beginningless and endless. Organisation, intelligence, and design, he opined, are inherent in matter as growth is in a tree. He did not believe in soul or spirit because it could not be detected in the body, and because it was a departure from physiological analogy. The idea 'I am,' according to him, was not the identification of spirit with matter, but a product of the mutation of matter in this cloud-like error-formed world. He believed in substance (Sat) and scoffed at un-substance (Asat). He asserted the subtlety and globularity of atoms which are uncreate. He made mind and intellect a mere secretion of the brain, or rather words expressing not a thing, but a state of things. Reason was to him developed instinct, and life an element of the atmosphere affecting certain organisms. He held good and evil to be merely geographical or historical expressions, and he opined that what is called evil is mostly an active and transitive form of good. Law was his great Creator of all things, but he refused a creator of law because such a creator would require another creator, and so on in a quasi-ininterminable series up to absurdity. This reduced his law to a manner of haphazard. To those who argued against him he asked them to prove whether they derived from him. He often might a man after he had jumbled a set of letters in a bag fling them out upon the ground before they would fall into an exact poem? he replied that the calculation was beyond his arithmetic, but that the man had only to jumble and fling long enough inevitably to arrive at that end. He rejected the necessity as well as the existence of revelation, and he did not credit the miracles of Krishna, because according to him, nature never suspends her laws, and, moreover, he had never seen aught supernatural. He ridiculed the idea of mahápralaya, or the great destruction, for as the world had no beginning so it will have no end. He objected to absorption, facetiously observing with the sage Jamadagni, that it was pleasant to eat sweetmeats, but that for his part he did not wish to become the sweetmeats itself. He would not believe that Vishnu had formed the universe out of the wax in his ears. He positively asserted that trees are not bodies in which the consequences of merit and demerit are received. Nor would he conclude that to men were attached rewards and punishments.

1 Meaning the place of reading the four Shatrás.
2 A certain goddess who plays tricks with mankind. If a son when grown up set differently from what his parents did, people say that he has been changed in the womb.
3 Shani is the planet Saturn, which has an exceedingly baleful influence in India as elsewhere.

1 The Eleatic or Materialistic school of Hindu philosophy, which agrees to exploded as intelligent separate First Cause.
2 The writings of this school give an excellent view of the 'progressive system,' which has popularly been asserted to be a modern idea. But Hindu philosophy seems to have exhausted every fancy that can spring from the brain of man.
mens from all eternity. He made light of the sanskara, or sacrament. He admitted Satwa, Raja, and Tama,1 but only as properties of matter. He acknowledged mental matter (ahulka-sašar), and atomic matter (ahulka-sašar), but not linga-sašar, or the archetype of bodies. To doubt all things was the foundation of his theory, and to scoff at all who would not doubt was the corner-stone of his practice. In debate he preferred logical and mathematical grounds, requiring a categorical 'because' in answer to his 'why?'. He was full of morality and natural religion, which some say is no religion at all. He gained the name of atheist by declaring with Gotama that there are innumerable worlds, that the earth has no essential blemish but the circumambient air, and that the core of the globe is inauspicious. And he was called a practical atheist—a worse form, apparently—for supporting the following dogma: 'that though creation may attest that a creator has been, it does not provide that a creator still exists.' On which occasion, Shiromani, a nonplussed theologian, asked him, 'By whom and for what purpose was thou sent on earth?' The yogi scoffed at the word 'sent,' and replied, 'Not being thy Supreme Intelligence, or Infinite Nihilism, I am unable to explain the phenomenon.' Upon which he quoted—

1.

How soon is darkness Gaur must be Who's guide is blind? Shiromani?

At length it so happened that the young men, having frequently been surprised in flagrant delicts, were summoned to the dread presence of the university gurus, who addressed them as follows:—

1. Satwa is the natural state of matter, Raja is passion acting upon nature, and Tama is extinguence. They are the three qualities (yuvās) of matter.
2. Spiritual preceptors and learned men.
3. Under certain limitations, gambling is allowed by Hindu law, and the winner has power over the person and property of the loser. No debts of honour in Hindostan!
4. Quotations from standard works on Hindu criminal law, which in some points at least are almost as absurd as our civilised codes.
5. Hindus carry their money tied up in a kind of sheet, which is wound round the waist and thrown over the shoulder. There are three qualities (yuvās) of matter.
6. A thief's manual in the Sanskrit tongue; it aspires to the dignity of a 'Scripture.'
7. All sounds, say the Hindus, are of similar origin, and they do not die; if they did, they could not be remembered.

1868]

Tales of Indian Devity.
respect them. Do not we say when it thunders awfully, 'the rascally gods are dying!' And, when it is too wet, 'these villain gods are sending too much rain?—Briefly, the young Brahman replied to and harangued them all so imper- mately, if not pertinently, that they, waxing angry, fell upon him with their staves, and drove him out of assembly.

Then the four thirftless youths returned home to their father, who in his just indignation had urged their disgrace upon the pandits and gurus, otherwise these dignitaries would never have resorted to such extreme measures with so dis- tinguished a house. He took the opportunity of turning them out upon the world, until such time as they might be able to show sub- stantial signs of reform. 'For,' he said, 'those who have read, science in their boyhood, and who in youth, agitated by evil passions, have remained in the insolence of ignorance, feel regret in their old age, and are consumed by the fire of avarice.' In order to supply them with a motive for the task proposed, he stopped their monthly allowance. But he added, if they would repair to the neighbouring university of Jayasthal, and there show themselves something better than a disgrace to their family, he would direct their maternal uncle to supply them with all the neces- saries of food and raiment.

In vain the youths attempted, with sighs and tears and threats of suicide, to soften the paternal heart. He was inexorable for two reasons. In the first place, after wondering away the wonder with which he regarded his own failure, he felt that this atonement was attached to the name of the pious and learned Vashnu Swami, whose lectures upon 'Management during Teens' and whose 'Brahman Young Man's Own Book' had become standard works. Secondly, from a sense of duty, he determined to omit nothing that might tend to reclaim the reprobates. As regards the monthly allowance being stopped, the revere- rend man had become every year a little fonder of his purse: he had hoped that his sons would have qualified themselves to take pupils, and thus shoulder the burden, as he phrased it, 'a genteel independence;' whilst they openly de- rided the career, calling it 'an admirable provision for the more indigent members of the middle classes.' For which reason he referred them to their maternal uncle, a man of known and remark- able penuriousness.

The four ne'er-do-wells, foreseeing what awaited them at Jayasthal, deferred it as a last resource; deter- mined first to see a little life, and to push their way in the world, before condemning themselves to the tribulations of reform.

They tried to live without a monthly allowance, and notably they failed; it was squeezing, as men say, oil from sand. The gambler, having no capital, and, worse still, no credit, lost two or three su- vernas at play and could not pay them; in consequence of which he was soundly beaten with iron-shod staves, and was nearly compelled by the keeper of the hell to sell himself into slavery. Thus he be- came disgusted; and telling his brethren that they would find him at Jayasthal, he departed with the intention of studying wisdom.

A month afterwards came the libertine's turn to be disappointed. He could no longer afford fine new clothes; even a well washed shirt became a luxury beyond his means. He had reckoned upon his handsome face, and he had matured a plan for laying various elderly conquests under contribution. 'Judge, there- fore, his disgust when all the women—high and low, rich and poor, old and young, ugly and beautiful—seeing the end of his waistcoat thrown empty over his shoulder, passed him in the streets without even deigning a look. The very shopkeepers' wives who once had adored his moustachio and had never ceased talking of his 'elegant' gait, despised him; and the wealthy old person who formerly supplied his small feet with the choicest slippers, left him to starve. Upon which he also, in a state of repentance, followed his brother to acquire knowledge.

'Ai am not,' quoth the thief to himself, 'a cat in climbing, a deer in running, a snake in twisting, a hawk in pouncing, a dog in scenting?—keen as a hare, tenacious as a wolf, strong as a lion, a lamp in the night, a horse on a plain, a man on a stony path; a boat in the water, a rock on land?''

The reply to his own question was of course affirmative. But despite all these fine qualities, and notwithstanding the scrupulous strictness in invoking the house-breaking tool and in devoting a due portion of his gains to the gods of plunder, he was caught in a store-room by the proprietor, who inexorably handed him over to justice. As he belonged to the untouchable caste, the fine imposed upon him was heavy. He could not pay it, and therefore he was thrown into a dungeon, where he remained for some time.

But at last he escaped from jail, when he made his parting bow to Karikiyey, stole a blanket from one of the guards, and set out for Jayasthal, cursing his old profession.

The atheist also found himself in a position that deprived him of all his pleasures. He delighted in after-dinner controversies, and in bringing the light troops of his wit to bear upon the unwieldy masses of lore and logic opposed to him by polemical Brahman, who, out of respect for his father, did not lay an action against him for over- powering them in theological dis- putation. In the strange city to which he had removed no one knew the son of Vashnu Swami, and no one cared to invite him to the house. Once he attempted his usual trick upon a knot of sages sitting round who, sitting round, were tawdrily recreating themselves with quoting mystical Sanskrit shlokas of abo- minable long-windedness. The re- sult was his being obliged to ploy his heels vigorously in flight from the jolly incensed leekriti, to whom he had said 'tush' and 'pish' at least a dozen times in as many minutes. He therefore also fol- lowed the example of his brethren, and started for Jayasthal with all possible expedition. Arrived at the house of their maternal uncle, the young men as by one assent began to attempt the unloosening of his purse-strings. Signally falling in this and in other

1. These are the qualifications specified by Hindu classical authorities as necessary to make a distinguished thief.
2. Every Hindu is in a manner born to a certain line of life, virtuous or vicious, honest or dishonest; and his Dharma, or religious duty, consists in conforming to the practice and the worship of his profession. The 'Thug,' for instance, worships Bhagwan, who enables him to murder successfully; and his remorse would arise from neglecting to murder.
3. Hindu law sensibly punishes, in theory at least, for the same offence the priest more severely than the layman; a hint for him to practise what he preaches.
4. The Hindu Mercury, god of rascals.
5. A penal offence in India. How is it that the English have omitted to codify it? The laws of Manu also punish severely all disdainful expressions, such as 'tush' or 'pish,' addressed during argument to a priest.
6. Stemma, generally speaking on serious subjects.

Gold pieces.
notable schemes, they determined to lay in that stock of facts and useful knowledge which might reconcile them with their father, and restore them to that happy life at Gaur which they then despised, and which now brought tears into their eyes.

Then they debated with one another what they should study.

That branch of the preternatural, popularly called ‘white magic,’ found with them favour.

They chose a guru or teacher strictly according to the orders of their faith, a wise man of honourable family and affable demeanour, who was not a gluton nor leperos, nor blind of one eye, nor blind of both eyes, nor very short, nor suffering from whomlows,1 asthma, or other disease, nor noisy and talkative, nor with any defect about the fingers and toes, nor subject to his wife.

A grand discovery had been lately made by a certain physiologico-philosophico-psychologico-materialist, a Jayasthalian. In investigating the vestiges of creation, the cause of causes, the effect of effects, and the original origin of that matter (mater) which some regard as an entity, others as a non-entity, others self-existent, others merely specious and therefore unexistent, he became convinced that the fundamental form of organic being is a globule having another globule within itself. After inhabiting a garret and diving into the depths of his self-consciousness for a few years of years, he was able to produce such complex globule in triturated and roasted stone by means of—II will not say what.

Happily for creation in general, the discovery died a natural death some centuries ago. An edifying spectacle, indeed, for the world to see: a cross old man sitting amongst his gallipots and crucibles, creating animalcule, providing the corpses of birds, beasts, and fishes with what is vulgarly called life, and supplying to epigenesis all the latest improvements!

In those days the invention, being a novelty, engrossed the thoughts of the universal learned, who were in a fever of excitement about it. Some believed in it so implicitly that they saw in every experiment a hundred things which they did not see. Others were so sceptical and contradictory that they would not perceive what they did see. Those blended with each fact their own deductions, whilst these span round every reality the web of their own prejudices. Curious to say, the Jayasthalian, amongst whom the luminous science arose, halted it with delight, whilst the Guarrians derided its claim to be considered an important addition to human knowledge.

Let me try to remember a few of their words.

Unfortunate human nature,’ wrote the wise of Gaur against the wise of Jayasthal, ‘wanted no crowning indignity but this! Yea had already proved that the body is made of the basest element—earth.
You had argued away the immortability, the ubiquity, the permanency, the eternity, and the divinity of the soul, for is not your favourite axiom, “It is the nature of limbs which thinketh in man?” The imortal mind is, according to you, an ignoble viscous; the god-like gift of reason is the innate gift of a cold somewhat highly developed. Stil you left us something to hope. Still you allowed us one boast. Still life was a thread connecting us with the Giver of Life. But now, with

1 Whitlows on the nails show that the sufferer, in the last life, stole gold from a Brahman.

2 Meaning in spite of themselves.
and importunity, at length, on a certain day, all the pious, learned, and reverend tutors, teachers, professors, procutors, pastors, spiritual fathers, poets, philosophers, mathematicians, schoolmasters, pedagogues, be-seers, seers, insitibors, gourmards, grinders, preceptors, dominoes, brushes, coryphæus, dry-nurses, coaches, mentors, monitors, lecturers, preceptors, fellows, and heads of houses at the university of Gaur, met together in a large garden, where they usually diverted themselves out of hours with ball-tossing, pigeon-taunting, and kite-flying.

Presently the four young men, carrying their bundle of bones and the other requisites, stepped forward, walking slowly with eyes downcast, like shrinking cattle: for it is said, the Brahman must not run, even when it rains.

After pronouncing an impromptu speech, composed for them by their father, and so stuffed with erudition that even the writer hardly understood it, they announced their wish to prove by ocular demonstration, the truth of a science upon which their short-sighted rivals of Jaya-sthal had cast cold water, but which, they remarked in the eloquent peroration of their discourse, the sages of Gaur had welcomed with that wise and catholic spirit of inquiry which had ever characterized their distinguished body.

Huge words, involved sentences, and the high-flew compliment, exceedingly undeserved, obscured, I suppose, the bright wits of the intellectual convolution, which really began to think that their liberality of opinion deserved all praise.

None objected to what was being prepared, except one of the heads of houses; his appeal was generally scouted, because his Sanskrit style was vulgarly intelligible, and he had the bad name of being a practical man. The metaphysician Rashik Lall sneered to Vaisvata the poet, who passed on the look to the theo-philosopher Varadhama. Haradatt the antiquarian whispered the metaphysician Vasudeva, who burst into a loud laugh; whilst Narayan, Jagadharma, and Devswami, all very learned in the Vedas, opened their eyes and stared at him with well simulated astonishment. So he, being offended, said nothing more, but arose and walked home.

A great crowd gathered round the four young men and their father, as opening the bundle that contained the tiger’s remains, they prepared for their task.

One of the operators spread the bones upon the ground and fixed each one into its proper socket, not forgetting even the teeth and tusks. The second connected the skeleton with the muscles and heart of an elephant, which he had procured for the purpose, by means of a marvellous unguent.

The third drew from his pouch the brain and eyes of a large tiger, which he carefully fitted into the animal’s skull, and then covered the body with the hide of a young rhinoceros.

Then the fourth—the atheist—who had been directing the operation, produced a globule having another globule within itself. And as the crowd pressed on them, crazing their necks, breathless with anxiety, he placed the Principle of Organic Life in the tiger’s body with such effect that the monster immediately heaved its chest, breathed, agitated its limbs, opened its eyes, jumped to its feet, shook itself, glanced around, and began to gnash its teeth and kick its chaps, lashing the while its ribs with its tail.

The sages sprang back and the beast sprang forward. With a roar like thunder during Elephants time,1 it flew at the nearest of the spectators, flung Vishnu Swami to the ground and clawed his four sons. Then, not even stopping to drink their blood, it hurried after the flying herd of wise men. Jostling and tumbling, stumbling and catching at one another’s long robes, they rushed in hottest haste towards the garden gate. But the beast having the muscles of an elephant as well as the bones of a tiger, made a few bounds of eighty or ninety feet each, easily distanced them, and took away all chance of escape. To be brief: as the monster was frightfully hungry after its long fast, and as the imprudent young men had furnished it with admirable implements of destruction, it did not cease its work till one hundred and twenty-one learned and highly distinguished pundits and grurs lay upon the ground chawed, clawed, sucked-dry, and in most cases stone-dead. Amongst them, I need hardly say, were the sage Vishnu Swami and his four sons.

Having told this story the Vampire hung silent for a time. Presently he resumed—’Now, heed my words, Raja Vikram! I am about to ask thee, Which of all those learned men was the most finished fool? The answer is easily found, yet it must be distasteful to thee. Therefore mortify thy vanity, as soon as possible, or I shall be talking and thou wilt be walking through this live-long night, to scanty purpose. Remember! science without understanding is of little use; indeed, understanding is superior to science, and those devoid of understanding, perish as did the persons who revivified the tiger. Before this, I warned thee to beware of thyself, and of thine own conceit. Here, then, is an opportunity for self-discipline—which of all those learned men was the greatest fool?’

The warrior king mistook the kind of mortification imposed upon him, and pondered over the uncomfortable nature of the reply—in the presence of his son.

Again the Baital taunted him. ‘The greatest fool of all,’ at last said Vikram, in slow and by no means willing accents, ‘was the father. Is it not said, “There is no fool like an old fool”? ’

‘Gramercy!’ cried the Vampire, bursting out into a discordant laugh, ‘I now return to my tree. By this head! I never before heard a father so readily condemn a father.’ With these words he disappeared, slipping out of the bundle.

The raja scooped his son a little for want of obedience, and said that he had always thought more highly of his acuteness—never could have believed that he would have been taken in by so shallow a trick. Dharma Dhuvaj answered not a word to this, but promised to be wiser another time.

Then they returned to the tree and did what they had so often done before.

And, as before, the Baital held his tongue for a time. Presently he began as follows.

---

1 When the moon is in a certain lunar mansion, at the conclusion of the wet season.
Vikram and the Vampire; or, Tales of Indian Devilry.
Adapted by
Richard F. Burton,
Vice-President, Anthropological Society, London.

The Vampire's Eighth Story.
Of the Use and Misuse of Magic Pills.

The lady Chandraprabha, daughter of the Raja Subichara, was a particularly beautiful girl, and marriageable withal. One day as Vasanta, the Spring, began to assert its reign over the world, animate and inanimate, she went accompanied by her young friends and companions to stroll about her father's pleasure garden. The fair troop wandered through sombre groves, where the dark tallai tree entwined its branches with the pale green foliage of the nin and the pippal's domes of quivering leaves contrasted with the columnar aisles of the banyan fig. They admired the old monarchs of the forest, bearded to the waist with hangings of moss, the flowing creepers delicately climbing from the lower branches to the topmost shoots, and the cordage of lianas stretching from trunk to trunk like bridges for the monkeys to pass over. Then they issued into a clear space dotted with azokas bearing rich crimson flowers, citheras of azure blue, madhavis exhibiting petals virgin white as the snows on Himalaya, and jasmines raining showers of perfumed blossoms upon the grateful earth. They could not sufficiently praise the tall and graceful stem of the arrowy arocs, contrasting with the solid pyramid of the cypress, and the more masculine stature of the palm. Now they lingered in the trellised walks closely covered over with vines and creepers; then they stopped to gather the golden bloom weighing down the mango bunches, and to smell the highly scented flowers that hung from the green festoon of the chamela.

It was spring, I have said. The air was still except when broken by the hum of the large black brama bee, as she plied his task amidst the red and orange flowers of the dak, and by the gushings of many waters that made music as they coursed down their stuccoed channels between borders of many coloured poppies and beds of various flowers. From time to time the dulcet note of the kokia bird, and the hoarseplaint of the turtle dove hid deep in her leafy bower, attracted every ear and thrilled every heart. The south wind, a breeze of the south, the friend of love and spring, blew with a voluptuous warmth, for rain clouds canopied the earth, and the breath of the narcissus, the rose, and the citron, teemed with a languid fragrance.

The charms of the season affected all the damsels. They amused themselves in their privacy with pelling blossoms at one another, running races down the smooth broad alleys, mounting the silken swings that hung between the orange trees, embracing one another, and at times trying to pull the butt of the party into the fish pond. Perhaps the liveliest of all was the lady Chandraprabha, who on account of her rank could pelt and push all the others. She lay there daintily, being pelled and pushed in return.

It so happened before the attendance had had time to secure privacy for the princess and her women, that Manaswi, a very handsome youth, a Brahman's son, had wandered without malicious intention into the garden. Fatigued with walking, and finding a cool shady place beneath a tree, he had lain down there, and had gone to sleep, and had not been observed by any of the king's people. He was still sleeping when the princess and her companions were playing together.

Presently Chandraprabha, weary of sport, left her friends, and singing a lively air tripped up the stairs leading to the summer house. Aroused by the sound of her advancing footsteps Manaswi sat up, and the princess seeing a strange man started. But their eyes had met and both were subdued by love, love vulgarly called 'love at first sight.'

'No sense!' exclaimed the warrior king, testily, 'I can never believe in that freak of Kama Deva.' He spoke feelingly, for the thing had happened to himself more than once, and on no occasion had it turned out well.

'But there is such a thing, O raja, as love at first sight,' objected the Baijar, speaking dogmatically.

'Then perhaps thou canst account for it, dead one,' growled the monarch, sourly.

'I have no reason to do so, O Vikram,' retorted the Vampire, 'when you men have already done it. Listen, then, to the words of the wise. In the olden time, one of your great philosophers invented a fluid pervading all matter, strongly self-repulsive like the steam of a brass pot, and widely spreading like the breath of scandal. The repulsiveness, however, according to that wise man, is greatly modified by the union of power, namely, an energetic attraction or adhesion to all material bodies. Thus every substance contains a part, more or less, of this fluid, pervading it throughout, and strongly bound to each component atom. He called it "Ambericity," for the best of reasons, as it has no connection with amber, and he described it as an imponderable, which, meaning that it could not be weighed, gives a very accurate and satisfactory idea of its nature.

'Now, said that philosopher, whenever two bodies containing that unweighable substance in unequal proportions happen to meet, a current of imponderable passes from one to the other producing a kind of attraction and tending to adhere. The operation takes place instantaneously when the force is strong and much condensed. Thus the vulgar, who call things after their effects and not from their causes, term the action of this imponderable "love at first sight." The distraction of the belief that it is a phenomenon of amiberticity. As regards my own opinion about the matter, I have long ago told it to you, O Vikram! Silliness.'

'Either hold your tongue, fellow, or go on with your story,' cried the raja, wearied out by so many words that had no manner of sense.

Well! the effect of the first glance was that Manaswi, the Brahman's son, fell back in a swoon and remained senseless upon the ground where he had been sitting; and the raja's daughter began to tremble upon her feet, and presently dropped unconscious upon the floor of the summer house. Shortly after this she was found by her companions and attendants, who, quickly taking her up in their arms and supporting her into a litter, conveyed her home.

Manaswi, the Brahman's son, was so completely overcome, that he could not think, and so he lay there daintily, being pelled and pushed in return.

1 In Hindostan, it is the prevailing wind of the hot weather.
1 Savants, sages.
Shashi by name, strayed into the garden, and stambled upon the body.

'Friend,' said Muldev, 'how came this youth thus to fall senseless on the ground?'

'doubtless some damsel has shot forth the arrows of her glance from the bow of her eyebrows, and hence he has become insensible!'

'We must lift him up then,' said Muldev, the benevolent.

'What need is there to raise him?' asked Shashi the misanthrope by way of reply.

Muldev, however, would not listen to these words. He ran to the pond hard by, sealed the end of his waistcloth in water, sprinkled it over the young Brahman, raised him from the ground, and placed him sitting against the wall. And perceiving, when he came to himself, that his sickness was rather of the soul than the body, the old men asked him how he came to be in that plight.

'We should tell our griefs,' answered Manaswi, 'only to those who will relieve us.' What is the use of communicating them to those who, when they have heard, cannot help us? What is to be gained by the empty pity or by the useless condolence of men in general?

The pandits, however, by friendly looks and words, presently persuaded him to break silence, when he said, 'A certain princess entered this summer house, and from the sight of her, I have fallen into this state. If I can obtain her, I shall live; if not, I must die.'

'Come with me, young man!' said Muldev the benevolent; 'I will use every endeavour to obtain her, and if I do not succeed, I will make thee wealthy and independent of the world.'

Manaswi rejoined, 'The Deity, in his beneficence, has created many jewels in this world, but the pearl, woman, is chiefest of all; and for her sake only does man desire wealth. What are riches to one who has abandoned his wife? What are they who do not possess beautiful wives? they are but imaginary joys! wealth is the fruit of virtue; ease of wealth; a wife of ease. And where no wife is, how can there be happiness?'

And the enamoured youth rumbled on in this way, curious to us, Raja Vikram, but perhaps natural enough in a Brahman's son suffering under that endemic malady—determination to marry.

'Whatever thou mayest desire,' said Muldev, 'shall by the blessing of heaven be given to thee.'

Manaswi implored him saying most pathetically, 'O pandit, bestow then that damsel upon me!'

Muldev promised to do so, and having comforted the youth led him to his own house. Then he welcomed him politely, seated him upon the carpet, and left him for a few minutes promising to return. When he reappeared, he held in his hand two little balls or pills, and showing them to Manaswi, he explained their virtues as follows:

'There is in our house an hereditary secret, by means of which I try to promote the weal of humanity. But in all cases my success depends mainly upon the purity and the heartwholeness of those that seek my aid. If thou place this in thy mouth, thou shalt be changed into a damsel twelve years old, and when thou withdrawest it again, thou shalt again recover thine original form. Beware, however, that thou use the power for none but a good purpose; otherwise some great calamity will befall thee. Therefore, take counsel of thyself before undertaking this trial!'

What lover, O warrior king Vikram, would have hesitated under such circumstances, to assure the pandit that he was the most in-

1 Vishnu, as a dwarf, sank down into and secured in the lower regions the Baja Bali, who by his piety and prayerfulness was subverting the reign of the lesser gods; as Rama he built a bridge between Lanka (Ceylon) and the main land; and as Rama he beheaded, by holding up an umbrella for them, his friends the shepherds and shepherdesses from the thunders of Indra, whose worship they had neglected.

2 The priestly caste sprang as has been said from the nobles part of the Devis eniges; the three others from lower members.

The priestly caste sprang as has been said from the nobles part of the Devis eniges; the three others from lower members.

A chew of betel leaf and spices is offered by the master of the house when dismissing a visitor.

1868] Tales of Indian Deities.
bride of a young Brahman, and she has been trusted to my protection for a time by her father-in-law. Take her therefore into the inner rooms, treat her with the utmost regard, and never allow her to be separated from thee, day or night, asleep or awake, eating or drinking, at home or abroad.

Chandra-prabha took the hand of Sita, and said, "Manaswini, so pleased was he to call thee—" and led the way to her own apartment. Once the seat of joy and pleasure, the rooms now wore a desolate and melancholy look. The windows were darkened, the attendants moved noiselessly over the carpets, as if their footsteps could cause headache, and there was a faint scent of some drug much used in cases of delirium. The apartments were handsome, but the only ornament in the room where they sat was a large bunch of withered flowers in an arched recess, and these, though possibly interesting to some one, were not likely to find favour as a decoration in the eyes of everybody.

The rajah's daughter paid the greatest attention and talked with unusual vivacity to the Brahman's daughter-in-law, either because she had no other eyes, or from some presentiment of what was to occur, whichever you please, Raja Vikram, and it is no matter which. Still, Sita could not help perceiving that there was a shade of sorrow upon the forehead of her fair new friend, and so when they retired to rest she asked the cause of it.

Then Chandra-prabha related to her the sad tale: "One day in the spring season, as I was strolling in the garden along with my companions, I beheld a very handsome Brahman, and our eyes having met, he became unconscious, and I also was insensible. My companions seeing my condition, brought me home, and therefore I know neither his name nor his abode. His beautiful form is impressed upon my memory. I have now no desire to eat or to drink, and from this distress my colour has become pale and my body is thus emaciated." And the beautiful princess sighed a sigh that was musical and melancholy, and concluded by predicting for herself—as persons similarly placed often do—a sudden and untimely end about the beginning of the next month.

"What will thy love do," asked the Brahman's daughter-in-law demurely, "if I show thee thy beloved at this very moment?"

The rajah's daughter answered, "I will ever be the lowest of thy slaves, standing before thee with joined hands."

Upon which Sita removed the pill from his mouth, and instantly having become Manaswini, put it carefully away in a little bag hung round her neck. At this sight Chandra-prabha felt abashed and hung down her head in beautiful confusion. "I will have no descriptions, Vampire! I cried the great Vikram, jerking the bag up and down as if he were sweating gold in it. "The fewer of thy descriptions the better for us all."

Briefly (resumed the demon), Manaswini reflected upon the eight forms of marriage—viz, Bramha-lagan, when a girl is given to a Brahman, or man of superior caste, without reward; Daiva, when she is presented as a gift or fee to the officiating priest at the close of a sacrifice; Aroha, when two cows are received by the father's infant exchange for the bride; Praja-pata, when the girl is given as a request of a Brahman, and the father says to his daughter and her betrothed, 'Go, fulfil the duties of religion.' Arunya, when man is received by the father in exchange for a bride; Rukhshas, when she is captured in war, or when her bridegroom overcomes his rivals; Parvati, when the girl is taken away from her father's house by craft; and eighthly, Gandharva-lagan, or the marriage that takes place by mutual consent.

Manaswini preferred the latter, especially as by her rank and age the princess was entitled to call upon her father for the Lakshmi Swayambara wedding, in which she would have chosen her own husband. And thus it is that Ramayana, Krishna, Nala, and others were proposed to by the princesses whom they married.

For five months after these nuptials, Manaswini never stirred out of the palace, but remained there by day a woman, and a man by night. The consequence was that he—call him 'he,' for whether Manaswini or Sita, his mind ever remained masculine—presently found himself in a fair way to become a father.

Now, one would imagine that a change of sex every twenty-four hours, would be variety enough to satisfy even a man. Manaswini, however, was not contented. He began to pine for more liberty, and to find fault with his wife for not taking him out into the world. And you might have supposed that a young person who, from love at first sight, had fallen senseless upon the steps of a summer house, and who had devoted herself to a sudden and untimely end because she was separated from her lover, would have repressed her yawns and little irritable words even for a year after having converted him into a husband. But no! Chandra-prabha soon felt as tired of seeing Manaswini and nothing but Manaswini, as Manaswini was weary of seeing Chandra-prabha and nothing but Chandra-prabha. Often she had been on the point of proposing visits and out of door excursions. But when at last the idea was first suggested by her husband, she at once became an injured woman. She hinted how foolish it was for married people to imprison themselves and quarrel all day. When Manaswini remonstrated, saying that he wanted nothing better than to appear before the world with her as his wife, but that he really did not know what her father might do to him, she threw out a cutting sarcasm upon his effeminate appearance during the hours of light. She then told him of an unfortunate young woman in an old nursery tale who had unconsciously married a fiend that became a fine handsome man at night when no eye could see him, and utter ugliness by day when good folk did not have him to advantage. And lastly, while weighing against the changeableness, fickleness, and infidelity of mankind, she quoted the words of the poet—

Out upon change! it tires the heart
And weeds the noble spirit down;
A vain vain world indeed thou art
That can such vile condition own;
The will hath fallen from me now
I cannot love where I despise. . . .

You can easily, O King Vikram, continue for yourself and conclude this lecture, which I leave unfinished on account of its length.

Chandra-prabha and Sita, who called each other the Zoical Twin and Laughter Light, and were the chieftest of all the auditors, easily persuaded the old rajah that their health would be further improved by air, exercise, Vikram and the Vampire; or, [November 1868]

Tales of Indian Devilry.

and distractions. Subichar, being delighted with the change that had taken place in a daughter whom he loved, and whom he had feared to lose, told them to do as they pleased.
They began a new life, in which short excursions and visits, baths and dances, music parties, drives in bullock chariots, and water excursions succeeded one another.

It so happened that one day the raja went with his whole family to a wedding feast in the house of his grand treasurer, where the latter's son saw Manaswini in the beautiful shape of Sita. This was a third case of love at first sight, for the young man immediately said to a particular friend, 'If I obtain that girl, I shall live; if not, I shall abandon life.'

In the meantime the king, having enjoyed the feast, came back to his palace with his whole family.
The condition of the treasurer's son however became very distressing, and through separation from his beloved, he gave up eating and drinking. The particular friend had kept the secret for some days, though burning to tell it. At length he found an excuse for himself in the sad state of his friend, and he immediately went and devolved all that he knew to the treasurer. After this he felt relieved.

The minister repaired to the court and laid his case before the king, saying, 'Great raja! through the love of that Brahman's daughter-in-law, my son's state is very bad; he has given up eating and drinking, in fact he is consumed by the fire of separation. If now your majesty could show compassion and bestow the girl upon him, his life would be saved.'

'Very true!' cried the raja, who hearing these words had waxed very wrth: 'it is not right for kings to do injustice. Listen! when a person puts any one in charge of a protector, how can the latter give away his trust without consulting the person that trusted him? And yet this is what you wish me to do.'

The treasurer knew that the raja could not govern his realm without his consent, and he was well acquainted with his master's character. He said to himself, 'This will not last long, but he remained dumb, simlating hopelessness, and hanging down his head, whilst Subichar alternately scolded and comforted him, in order to open his lips. Then with tears in his eyes he muttered a request to take leave, and as he passed through the palace gates, he said aloud, with a resolute air, 'It will cost me but ten days of fasting!'

The treasurer having returned home collected all his attendants and went straightway to his son's room. Seeing the youth still stretched upon his sleeping mat and very yellow for the want of food, he took his hand, and said in a whisper, meant to be audible,
'Alas! poor son, I can do nothing but perish with thee.'

The servants bearing this threat slipped one by one out of the room, and each went to tell his friend that the grand treasurer had resolved to live no longer. After which they went back to the house and saw if their master intended to keep his word, and curious to know if he did intend to die, how, where, and when it was to be. And they were not disappointed: I do not mean that they wished their lord to die, as he was a good master to them, but still there was an excitement in the thing—

Raja Vikram could not refrain from showing his anger at the insult thus cast by the Baital upon him. He was a good and honest man, but when he saw that the treasurer had resolved to die, he determined to save him, even if he had to sacrifice himself.

When the treasurer had spent three days without touching bread or water, all the cabinet council met and determined to retire from business unless the raja yielded to their solicitation. The treasurer was their working man. 'Besides which,' said the cabinet council,
'if a certain person gets into the habit of refusing us, what is to be the end of it, and what is the use of being cabinet councillors any longer?'

Early on the next morning, the ministers went before the raja in a body, and humbly represented that 'the treasurer's son is at the point of death, the effect of a full heart and an empty stomach. Should he die, the father, who has not eaten or drunk during the last three days' the raja trembled to hear the intelligence, though he knew it,' 'his father, we say, cannot be saved. If the father dies the affairs of the kingdom come to ruin,—is he not the grand treasurer? It is already said that half the accounts have been gnawed by white ants and that some precious substance in the ink has eaten jagged holes through the paper, so that the other half of the accounts is ilegible. It was best, sirs, that you give us.

The white ants and corrosive ink were too strong for the raja's determination. Still, wishing to save appearances, he replied with much firmness, that he knew the value of the treasurer and his son, that he would do much to save them, but that he had passed his royal word, and had undertaken a trust. That he would rather die a dozen deaths than break his promise, or not discharge his duty faithfully. That man's condition in this world is to depart from it, none remaining in it;
that one comes and that one goes, knowing when or where; but that totality is eternity for happiness or misery. And much of the same nature, not very novel, and not, perhaps, quite to the purpose, but

Vol. LXXXVII.—No. COCCLXVII.

edifying to those who knew what lay behind the speaker's words.

The ministers did not know their lord's character so well as the grand treasurer, and they were more impressed by his firm denial and the number of his words than he wished them to be. After allowing his speech to settle in their minds, he did away with a great part of its effect by declaring that such were the sentiments and principles—

When a man talks of his principles, O Vikram! ask thyself the reason why—instilled into his youthful mind by the most honourable fathers, and the most virtuous of mothers. At the same time that he was by no means obstinate or proof against conviction. In token whereof his gracious permission the councillors to convince him that it was his royal duty to break his word and betray his trust, and to give away another man's wife.

Pray do not lose your temper, O warrior king! Subichar, although a raja, was a weak man; and you know, or you ought to know, that the wicked may be wise in their generation, but the weak never can.

Well, the ministers hearing their lord's last words, took courage, and proceeded to work upon his mind by the figure of speech popularly called 'rigmarole.' They said:
'Great king! that old Brahman has been gone many days, and has not returned; he is probably dead and burnt. It is therefore right that by giving to the grand treasurer's son his daughter-in-law, who is only affianced, not fairly married, you should establish your government firmly. And even if he should return, bestow villages and wealth upon him; and if he be not then worthy of such a match, you may give him your beautiful wife for his son, and dis-

Subichar, having heard them, dismissed them, with the remark that as so much was to be said on both sides, he must employ the night in thinking over the matter, and that he would on the next day favour them with his decision. The cabinet counselors knew by this that he meant that he would go and consult his wives. They retired contented, convinced that every voice would be in favour of a wedding; and that the young girl, with so good an offer, would not sacrifice the present to the future.

That evening the treasurer and his son supped together.
The first words uttered by Raja Subichar, when he entered his daughter’s apartment, was an order addressed to Sita, ‘Go thou once to the house of my treasurer’s son.’

Now, as Chandraprabha and Manaswi were generally scolding each other, Chandraprabha and Sita were hardly on speaking terms. When they heard the raja’s order for their separation they—

‘Delighted?’ cried Dharma Dhvaj, who for some reason took the greatest interest in the narrative.

‘Overwhelmed with grief, thou most guileless Yuvva Raja (young prince)!’ ejaculated the Vampire.

Raja Vikram reproved his son for talking about things of which he knew nothing, and the Baital resumed.

They turned pale and wept, and wrung their hands, and begged and argued and refused obedience. In fact they did every thing to make the king revoke his order.

‘The virtue of a woman,’ quoth Sita, ‘is destroyed through too much beauty; the religion of a Brahman is impaired by serving kings; a cow-slaughtered by disaster and want; and prosperity departs from the house where promises are not kept.’

The raja highly applauded the sentiment, but was firm as a rock upon the subject of Sita marrying the treasurer’s son.

Chandraprabha observed that her royal father, usually so conscientious, must not be acting from interested motives, and that when selfishness sways a man right becomes left, and left becomes right, as in the reflection of a mirror.

Subichar approved of the comparison; he was not quite so resolved, but he showed no symptoms of changing his mind.

Then the Brahman’s daughter-in-law, with the view of gaining time, a famous stralagem amongst femailines, said to the raja, ‘Great king, if you are determined upon giving me to the grand treasurer’s son, exact from him the promise that he will do what I bid him. Only on this condition will I ever enter his house!’

‘Speak, then,’ asked the king; ‘what will he have to do?’

She replied, ‘I am of the Brahman or priestly caste, he is the son of a Kshatriya or warrior; the law twain exalted wed, he should perform Yatra (pilgrimage) to all the holy places.’

‘Thou hast spoken veda-truth, girl,’ answered the raja, not sorry to have found so good a pretext for temporizing, and at the same time to preserve his character for firmness, resolution, determination.

That night Manaswi and Chandraprabha, instead of scolding each other, congratulated themselves upon having escaped an immense danger—which they did not escape.

In the morning, Subichar set for his ministers, including the grand treasurer and his love-sick son, and told them how wise and wisely the Brahman’s daughter-in-law had spoken upon the subject of the marriage. All of them approved of the condition; but the young man ventured to suggest, that whilst he was a pilgrimizing the maids should reside under his father’s roof. As he and his father showed a disposition to continue their fasta in case of the small favour not being granted, the raja, though very loath to separate his beloved daughter and her dear friend, was driven to do it. And Sita was carried off, weeping bitterly, to the treasurer’s palace. That dignitary solemnly committed her to the charge of his third and youngest wife, the lady Subhagyasundari, who was about her own age, and said, ‘You must both live together, without any kind of wrangling or contention, and do not go into other people’s houses.’ And the grand treasurer’s son went off to perform his pilgrimages.

It is no less sad than true, Raja Vikram, that in less than six days, the disconsolate Sita waxed weary of being Sita, took the ball out of her mouth, and became Manaswi. Alas for the infidelity of mankind! But it is gratifying to reflect that he met with the punishment with which the Pandit Muldev had threatened him. One night the magic pill slipped down his throat. When morning dawned, being unable to change himself into Sita, Manaswi was obliged to escape through a window from the lady Subhagya-Sundari’s room. He sprained his ankle with the leap, and he lay for a time upon the ground—where I leave him whilst convenient to me.

When Muldev quitted the presence of Subichar, he resumed his old shape, and returning to his brother Pandit Shashi, told him what he had done. Whereupon Shashi, the misanthrope, looked black, and used hard words, and told his friend that good nature and soft-heartedness had made him to commit a very bad action—a grievous sin. In conseained at this charge, the philanthropic Muldev became angry, and said, ‘I have warned the youth about his purity, what harm can come of it?’

‘Thou hast,’ retorted Shashi, with irritating coolness, ‘placed a sharp weapon in a fool’s hand.’

‘I have not,’ cried Muldev, indignantly.

‘Therefore,’ drawled the malevolent, ‘you are answerable for all the mischief he does with it, and mischief assuredly he will do.’

‘He will not, by Brahma!’ exclaimed Muldev.

‘He will, by Vishnu!’ said Shashi, with an amiable probability by having completely upset his friend’s temper; ‘and if within the coming six months he does not disgrace himself, thou shalt have the whol of my book-case; but if he does, the philanthropic Muldev will use all his skill and ingenuity in procuring the daughter of Raja Subichar as a wife for his faithful friend Shashi.

Having made this covenant, they both agreed not to speak of the matter till the autumn.

The appointed time drawing near, the pandits began to make inquiries about the effect of the magic pills. Presently they found out that Sita, alias Manaswi, had one night mysteriously disappeared from the grand treasurer’s house, and had not been heard of since that time. This, together with certain other things that transpired presently, convinced Muldev, who had cooled down in six months, that his friend had won the wager.

He prepared to make honourable payment by handing a pill to old Shashi, who at once became a stout, handsome young Brahman, some twenty years old. Next putting a pill into his own mouth, he resumed the shape and form under which he had first appeared before Raja Subichar, and leaning upon his staff he led the way to the palace.

The king, in great confusion, at once recognised the old priest, and guessed the errand upon which he and the youth were come. However, he saluted them, and offered them seats, and receiving their blessings, he began to make inquiries about their health and welfare. At last he mustered courage to ask the old Brahman who he had been living for so long a time.

‘Great king,’ replied the priest, ‘I went to seek after my son, and having found him, I bring him to your majesty. Give him his wife and I will take them both home with me.’

Raja Subihar prevailed not a little, but presently being hard pressed, he related everything that had happened.

‘What is this that you have done?’ cried Muldev, simulating excessive anger and astonishment.

‘Why have you given my son’s wife in marriage to another man? You have done what you wished, and now, therefore, receive my shrap (curse)!’

The poor raja, in great trepidation, said, ‘O Divinity! be not thus angry! I will do whatever you bide.’

Said Muldev, ‘If through dread of my excommunication you will freely give whatever I demand of you, then marry your daughter, Chandraprabha, to this my son. Only the condition I forgive you. To me, now, a necklace of pearls and a venomous krishna (cobra capella); the most powerful enemy and the kindest friend; the most precious gem and a clod of earth; the softest bed and the hardest stone; a blade of grass and the loveliest woman—are precisely the same. All I desire is that in some holy place, repeating the name of God, I may soon end my days.’

Subihar, terrified by this additional show of sanctity, at once summoned an astrologer, and fixed upon the suspicious moment and lunar influence. He did not consult the princess, and had he done so, she would not have resisted his wishes. Chandraprabha had heard of Sita’s escape from the treasurer’s house, and she had on the subject her own sensations. Besides which she now resolutely set forward to a certain event, and she was by no means sure that her royal father approved of the Gandharva form of marriage—above all for his daughter. Thus the Brahman’s son receiving in due course of the law, and his dowry, took leave of the king and returned to his own village.

Hardly, however, had Chandraprabha been married to Shashit the pandit, when Manaswati went to him, and began to wrangle, and said, ‘Give me my wife!’ He had recovered from the effects of his fall, and having lost her he therefore loved her—very dearly.

But Shashit proved by reference to the astrologers, priests, and ten persons as witnesses, that he had duly wedded her, and brought her to his home; ‘therefore,’ said he, ‘she is my spouse.’

Manaswati swore by all holy things that he had been legally married to her, and that he was the father of her child that was about to be born. ‘How then,’ continued he, ‘can she be thy spouse?’ He would have summoned Muldev as a witness, but that worthy, after reconquering with him, disappeared.

He called upon Chandraprabha to confirm his statement, but she put on an innocent face, and indignantly denied ever having seen the man.

Still, continued the Baital, many people believed Manaswati’s story, as it was marvellous and incredible. Even to the present day, there are many who decidedly think him legally married to the daughter of Raja Subihar.

‘Then they are pestilent fellows!’ cried the warrior king, Vikram, who hated nothing more than clandestine and runaway matches.

No one knew that the villain, Manaswati, was the father of her child; whereas, the Pandit Shashit married her lawfully, before witnesses, and with all the ceremonies. She, therefore, remains his wife, and the child will perform the funeral obsequies for him, and offer worship to the names of his pithirs (ancestors). At least, so say law and justice.

‘Which justice is often unjust enough!’ cried the Vampire; ‘and plly to legs, mighty raja! let me see if thou canst reach the sirsas before I do.’

‘The next story, O Raja Vikram, is remarkably interesting.’

The Vampires Ninth Story.

Shewing that a Man’s Wife Belongs Not to His Body But to His Head.

Far and wide through the lovely land overrun by the Arya from the Western Highlands spread the fame of Unmaddini, the beautiful daughter of Haridas the Brahman. In the numberless odes, sonnets, and acrostics addressed to her by a hundred pandits and poets her charms were sung with prodigies of triteness. Her presence was compared to light shining in a dark house; her face to the full moon; her complexion to the yellow champan flower; her curls to female snakes; her eyes to those of the deer; her eyebrows to bent bows; her teeth to strings of little opals; her feet to rubies and red gems; and her gait to that of the wild goose. And none forgot to say that her voice affected the author like the song of the kokila bird, sounding from the shadowy brake, when the breeze blows coolly, or that the fairy beings of Indra’s heaven would have shrank away abashed at her liveliness.

But, Raja Vikram! all the poets failed to win the fair Unmaddini’s love. To praise the beauty of a beauty is not to praise her. Extol her wit and talents, which has the zest of novelty, then you may succeed. For the same reason, read inversely, the plainer and cleverer is the bosom you would fire, the more personal you must be upon the subject of his grace and self-complacency. Flatterers and the deep must be ever the match which kindles the flame of love. True is that by some of families, it is that by some respects to Haridas, and telling him their wishes, they were directed to come early on the next morning and to enter upon the first ordeal—an intellectual conversation.

1 This would be the verdict of a Hindu jury.
2 Because stained with the powder of Mehndi, or the Lawsonia inermis shrub.
3 Kansa’s son; so called because the god Shiva, when struck by his shafts, destroyed him with a fiery glance.

This they did. Therefore those assembled together looked with great respect upon the man of valour.

Devasharma, the fourth suitor, contented himself with listening to the others, who fancied that he was overawed by their cleverness. And when it came to his turn he simply remarked, 'Silence is better than speech.' Being further pressed, he said, 'A wise man will not proclaim his age, nor a deception practiced upon himself, nor his riches, nor the loss of riches, nor family faults, nor incantations, nor conjugal love, nor medicinal prescriptions, nor religious duties, nor gifts, nor respect, nor the infidelity of his wife.'

Thus ended the first trial. The master of the house dismissed the two former speakers, with many polite expressions and some trifling presents. Then having given betel to them, scented their garments with attar, and sprinkled rose water over their heads, he accompanied them to the door showing much regret. The two latter speakers begged to come on the next day.

Gunakar and Devasharma did not fail. When they entered the assembly-room and took the seats pointed out to them, the father said, 'Be ye pleased to explain and make manifest the effects of your mental qualities. So shall I judge of them.'

'I have made,' said Gunakar, 'a four-wheeled carriage, in which the power resides to carry you in a moment wherever you may purpose to go.'

'I have such power over the angel of death,' said Devasharma, 'that I can at times raise a corpse, and enable my friends to do the same.'

Now tell me by thy brains, O warrior King Vikram, which of these two youths was the fitter husband for the maid?

Either the raja could not answer the question, or perhaps he would not, being determined to break the spell which had already kept him walking to and fro for so many hours. Then the Baital, who had paused to let his royal carrier contain himself, seeing that the attempt had failed, proceeded without making any further comment.

The beautiful Unmadini was brought out, but she hung down her head and made no reply. Yet she took care to move both her eyes in the direction of Devasharma. Whereupon Haridas, quoting the proverb that 'pearls string with pearls,' formally betrothed to him his daughter.

The soldiers twisted the ends of his mustachio into his eyes, which were red with wrath, and fumbled with his fingers about the hilt of his sword. But he was a man of noble birth, and presently his anger passed away.

Mahasani, the poet, however, being a shameless person—and when can we be safe from such?—forced himself into the assembly and began to rage and to storm, and to quote proverbs in a loud tone of voice. He remarked that in this world women are a mine of grief, a poisonous root, the abode of solicitude, the destroyers of resolution, the occasioners of fascination, and the plunderers of all virtuous qualities. From the daughter he passed to the father, and after saying hard things of him as a 'Maha-Brahman,' took cows and gold and worshipped a monkey, he fell with a sweeping censure upon all priests and sons of priests, more especially Devasharma. As the bystanders were astonished with him, he became more violent, and when Haridas, who was a weak man, appeared terrified by his voice, look, and gesture, he swore a solemn oath that despite all the outcasts in the world, unless Unmadini became his wife he would commit suicide, and as a demon haunt the house and injure the inmates.

Gunakar the soldier extorted this shameless poet to play himself at once, and to go where he pleased. But as Haridas reproved the warrior for inhumanity, Mahasani rounded by spite, love, rage, and perversity to a heroic death, drew a noisy from his bosom, rushed out of the house and suspended himself to the nearest tree.

And, true enough, as the midnight gong struck, he appeared in the form of a gigantic rakshasa (fiend) dreadfully frightened the household of Haridas, and carried off the lovely Unmadini, leaving word that she was to be found on the topmost peak of Himalaya.

The unhappy father hastened to the house where Devasharma lived. There, weeping bitterly and wringing his hands in despair, he told the terrible tale, and besought his intended son-in-law to be up and doing.

The young Brahman at once sought his late rival and asked his aid. This the soldier granted at once, although he had been nettled.

1 Great Bruman; used contemptuously to priests who officiate for servile men. Brumans lose their honour by the following things: by becoming servants to the king; by pursuing the business; by becoming priests to Shudra (servants); by officiating as priests for a whole village; and by neglecting any part of the three daily services. Many violate these rules; yet to kill a Bruman is still one of the five great Hindu sins.

In the present age of the world, the Bruman may not accept a gift of cows or gold; of course, he despises the law.
This he divided into three parts, one for each, and told his companions that in case of grievous bodily injury, the bit of thread would instantly make it whole. After which he taught them the Mantra, or mystical word by which the lives of men are restored to their bodies, even when they have taken their allotted places amongst the stars, and which for evident reasons I do not want to repeat. It concluded, however, with the three Vyahritris, or sacred syllables—

Bhū, Bhuvāḥ, Svām.

Raja Vikram was perhaps a little disappointed by this declaration. He made no remark, however, and the Baital thus pursued:

As Devasharma foretold, an accident of a terrible nature did occur. On the evening of that day, as they emerged upon the plain, they were attacked by the Kiratas, or savage tribes of the mountain. A small, black, wiry figure, armed with a bow and little cane arrows, stood to their weapon-signifying by each neck, but the shades of evening were fast deepening, and in her agitation, confusion and terror, she made a curious mistake by applying the heads of the wrong trunks. After which, she again sat down, and having recited her prayers, she pronounced, as her husband had taught her, the life-giving incantation.

In a moment the dead men were made alive. They opened their eyes, shook themselves, sat up and handled their limbs as if to feel that all was right. But something or other appeared to them, all wrong. They placed their palms upon their foreheads, and looked downwards, and started to after a set pace, informed her and his friend that a terrible calamity was about to befall them. He then drew from his travelling wallet a skein of thread.

1 The celebrated Gayatri, the Mostem Kalaham.

2 Kama again.
the wild men had left upon them, and lastly one began to eye the other with curious puzzled looks.

The wife, attributing their gestures to the confusion which one might expect to find in the brains of men who have just undergone so great a trial as amputation of the head must be, stood before them for a moment or two. She then with a cry of gladness flew to the bosom of the individual who was as she supposed her husband. He repulsed her, telling her that she was mistaken. Then, blushing deeply in spite of her other emotions, she threw both her beautiful arms round the neck of the person who must be, she naturally concluded, the right man. To her utter confusion, he also shrunk back from her embrace.

Then a horrid thought flashed across her mind: she perceived her fatal mistake, and her heart almost ceased to beat.

'This is thy wife!' cried the Brahman's head that had been fastened to the soldier's body.

'No she is thy wife!' replied the soldier's head which had been placed upon the Brahman's body.

'Then she is my wife!' rejoined the first compound creature.

'By no means! she is my wife,' cried the second.

'What then am I?' asked Devasharma-Ganakar.

'What do you think I am?' answered Ganakar-Devasharma, with another question.

'Unnadini shall be mine,' quoth the head.

'You lie, she shall be mine,' shouted the body.

'Holy Yama, hear the villa.'

exclaimed both of them at the same moment.

In short, having thus begun, they continued to quarrel violently, each one declaring that the beautiful Unnadini belonged to him and to him alone. They disputed Brahma the Lord of creatures only knows. I do not, except by cutting off their heads once more, and putting them in their proper places. And I am quite sure, O Raja Vikram! that thy states are quite unfit to answer the question. To which of these two is the beautiful Unnadini wife? It is even said — amongst us Baitals — that when this pair of half-husbands appeared in the presence of the Just King, a terrible confusion arose, each head declaring all the sins and peccadillos which its body had committed, and that Yama the holy king himself bit his forefinger with vexation.

Here the young prince Dharma Dwaj burst out laughing at the ridiculous idea of the wrong heads. And the warrior king, who like single-minded fathers in general was ever in the idea that his son had a vellacity for deriding and otherwise vexing him, began a severe course of reproof. He reminded the prince of the common saying that remittance without cause degrades a man in the opinion of his fellows, and enjoined him with a quotation extensively used by grave fathers, namely that the loud laugh bespeaks a vacant mind. After which he proceeded with much pomposity to pronounce the following opinion:

'It is said in the Shastras —'

Your majesty need hardly display so much erudition! Doubtless it comes from the lips of Jayadeva or some other one of your Nine Gems of Science, who know much more about their songs and their stanzas than they do about their scriptures, insensibly interrupted the Baital, who never lost an opportunity of carping at those reverend men.

'It is said in the Shastras,' continued Raja Vikram sternly, after hesitating whether he should or should not administer a corporal correction to the Vampire, 'that Mother Ganga is the queen amongst rivers, and the mountain Samara is the monarch among mountains, and the tree Halpa-vriksha is the king of all trees, and the head of man is the best and most excellent of limbs. And thus, according to this reason, the wife belonged to him whose noblest position claimed her.'

'The fact remains!' exclaimed the raja, 'does not the soul or conscious life enter the body through the sagittal suture and lodge in the brain, thence to contemplate, through the same opening, the divine perfections? I must however bid you farewell for the moment, O warrior king, Sakadibapi — Vikramaditya. I feel a sudden and ardent desire to change this cramped position for one more natural to me.'

The warrior monarch had so far committed himself that he could not prevent the Baital from frittering. But he lost no more time in following him than a grain of mustard, in its fall, stays on a cow's horn. And when he had thrown him over his shoulder, the king desired him

1 The Gauges, in heaven called Mandakini. I have no idea why we still adhere to our venerable corruption of the word.

The fabulous mountain supposed by Hindu geographers to occupy the centre of the universe.

2 The all-besowing tree in Indra's Paradise, which grants everything asked of it. It is the Tuba of El Islam, and is not unknown to the Apocryphal New Testament.

3 The Hebrews, like the Hindus, held the northern parts of the world to be higher than the southern.

4 The Hebrew word for the word is "the man who is walking in that direction, and seek him where he is going."
of his own accord to begin a new tale.

'O my left eyelid flutters,' exclaimed the Baital in despair, 'my heart throbs, my sight is dim; surely now beginneth the end. It is as Vidyasa hath written on my forehead—how can it be otherwise? Still listen, O mighty raja, whilst I recount to you a true story, and Saraswati sit on my tongue.'

1 On the sixth day after the child's birth, the god Vidyasa writes all its fate upon its forehead. The Moors have a similar idea, and probably it passed to the Hindus.
2 Goddess of eloquence. 'The waters of the Saraswati' is the classical Hindu phrase for the mirage.

MORE than once in their history Frenchmen have seen, with jealous hatred, an Italian invasion of their court, and dark indeed are the colours in which the foreign favourites are invariably depicted. Battle, murder, and sudden death follow in their train; poison and witchcraft are their constant weapons of offence and defence, sometimes employed at the bidding of their royal masters and mistresses, sometimes treacherously turned against them; for when was the Italian supposed to be other than subtle, wary, fawning, and treacherous in the popular belief of nations less versatile or less gifted with the art of pleasing? This feeling of hatred to the foreigner it was that, in the wars and tumults of the Fronde, made bourgeois, courtiers, nobles, and princes of the blood rally alike to the cry of 'Point de Mazarin!' whom Anne of Austria had made absolute master of France and of herself. The history of that stormy time, is it not written by the pen of one who fought and intrigued through it all against his brother cardinal with every malicious wile that restless vanity and fierce ambition could suggest, and by many other memoir writers besides Paul de Gondi? Its main features and its results are all familiar; but the personal biographies of that family which the successful churchman sought to found and endow with his enormous wealth, and the varied and powerful alliances which he formed, are less well known, though they make a truly curious chapter in the chronicle of the siècle Louis XIV. The obscure birth of the cardinal, we find, is a fertile theme for the authors of the Mazarinades, as the scurrilous pamphlets and epigrams of the Fondeurs were called, nor are any contemporary notices more flattering. Looking down from the lofty empyrean of his own far-descended line, St. Simon gravely but contemptuously remarks: 'Jamais on n'a pu remonter plus haut que le père de cette trop fameuse Eminence, ni savoir où elle est née, ni quoi que ce soit de sa première jeunesse. On sait seulement qu'ils étaient de Sicile.' The great Condé speaks of his enemy as 'ce ignorant de Sicile,' and 'Sicilien' becomes at once the mot d'ordre with the rhymesters of the party. The Val de Mazare in Sicily was supposed to have given a name to the nameless peasant his father, of whom Scarron and de Retz speak as a bankrupt tradesman in Rome, but who nevertheless we know rose high enough in the social scale to marry an heiress of the great Orsini family. In modern days, M. Léon Laborde thinks he has discovered proofs of the great statesman's patrician birth and aristocratic training, but they are far from conclusive; and if we are to consider a certain manuscript found in the royal library at Turin in 1855 as a genuine production (of which there seems no reasonable doubt), we now possess an authentic history of the birth and parentage of Giulio Mazarino, from the pen of an early friend and schoolfellow. This anonymous writer, whose work is apparently addressed to some member of the royal house of Savoy, about the year 1677, when, in the person of Prince Eugène of Savoy-Carignan, Conte de Soissons, it had allied itself with the cardinal's niece Olympia, tells us that Pietro, father of Giulio, was born in a Sicilian village, called Mazarino, and thence took his surname. He came to seek a fortune in Rome, on the strength of the proverb, that
Vikram and the Vampire; or, Tales of Indian Devilry.

Adapted by Richard F. Burton,
Vice-President,Anthropological Society, London.

The Vampire’s Tenth Story. Of the Marvelous Delicacy of Three Queens.

The Baital said, O king, in the Gaur country, Vanderbilt by name, there is a city, and one called Gunsheshkar was the raja of that land. His minister was one Abhachand, a Jain, by whose teaching the king also came into the Jain faith.

The worship of Shiva and Vishnu, gifts of cows, gifts of lands, gifts of rice balls, gaming, and spirit drinking, all these he prohibited. In the city no man could get leave to do them, and as for boses into the Ganges no man was allowed to throw them, and in these matters the minister, having taken orders from the king, caused a proclamation to be made about the city saying, ‘Whoever these acts shall do, the raja having confiscated, will punish him and banish him from the city.’

Now one day the Diwan began to say to the raja, ‘O great king, to the decisions of the Faith be pleased to give ear. Whosesoever takes the life of another, his life also in the future is taken: this very sin causes him again and again to be born on earth and to die. And thus he ever continues to be born and to die. Hence for one who has found entrance into this world to cultivate religion is right and proper. Be pleased to behold! By love, by wrath, by pain, by desire; and by fascination overpowered, the gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahadeva (Shiva) in various ways upon the earth are ever becoming incarnate. Far better than they the Cow, who is free from passion, eminity, drunkenness, anger, covetousness, and inordinate affection, who supports mankind, and whose progeny in many ways give ease and solace to the creatures of the world. These deities and sages (munis) believe in the Cow.‘

‘For such reason to believe in the gods is not good. Upon this earth to be pleased to believe in the Cow. It is our duty to protect the life of cows, because from the elephant, through ants, beast, and birds, up to man. In the world righteousness equal to that there is none. Those who eat the flesh of other creatures increase their own flesh; shall in the fulness of time assuredly obtain the fruition of Naraka; therefore for a man it is proper to attend to the conservation of life. They who understand not the pain of other creatures, what to mention to slay and to devour them, last but few days in the land and return to mundane existence, maimed, limping, one-eyed, blind, dwarfed, hunch-backed, and imperfect in such wise. Just as they consume the bodies of beasts and birds, even so they end by spoiling their own bodies. From drinking spirits also the great sin arises, hence the consuming of spirits and flesh is not advisable.

The raja, hearing in this manner explained to the king the sentiments of his own mind, so brought him over to the Jain faith, that whatever he said so the king did. Thus in Brahmanas, in jognis, in janginis, in sovaras, in sannyasis, and in religious mendicants, no man believed, and according to this creed the rule was carried on.

Now one day, being in the power of Death, Raja Gunsheshkar died. Then his son Dharmadhavaj sat upon the carpet (throne) and began to rule. Presently he caused the minister Abhachand to be seized, had his head shaved all but seven locks of hair, ordered his face to be blackened, and mounting him on an ass, with drums beaten, had him led all about the city, and drove him from the kingdom. From that time he carried on his rule free from all anxiety.

It so happened that in the season of spring, the king Dharmadhavaj taking his queens with him, went for a stroll in the garden, where there was a large tank with lotuses blooming within it. The raja admiring its beauty, took off his clothes and went down to bathe.

After plunging a flower and coming to the bank, he was going to give it into the hands of one of his queens, when it slipped from his fingers, fell upon her foot, and broke it with the blow. The raja being alarmed, at once came out of the tank and began to apply remedies to her.

Hereupon night came on and the moon shone brightly: the falling of its rays on the body of the second queen formed blisters. And suddenly from a distance the sound of a wooden pestle came out of a householder’s dwelling, when the 1 This story is perhaps the least interesting in the collection. I have translated it literally, in order to give an idea of the original. The reader will remark in the source of our own nursery tale about the princess who was so high born and delicately bred, that she could discover the three peas laid beneath a straw mattress and four feather beds. The Hindus, however, believe that Sybaritism can be carried so far; I remember my paedist justifying the truth of the story.

2 A minister. The word, as is the case with many in this collection, is quite modern Moslem, and anachronistic.

3 The cow is called the mother of the gods, and is declared by Bramha, the first person of the triad, Vishnu and Shiva being the second and the third, to be a proper object of worship. ‘If a European speak to the Hindu about eating the flesh of cows, says an old missionary, ‘they immediately raise their hands to their ears; yet milkmen, cowmen, and farmers beat the cow as unmercifully as a carrier of coals beats his ass in England.’

The Jainas or Jainas (from j, to conquer; as subduing the passions) are one of the atheistical sects with whom the Brahmanas have of old carried on the fiercest religious controversies, ending in many a sanguinary fight. Their tenets are consequently exaggerated and ridiculed, as in the text. They believe that there is no such God as the common notions on the subject exist out, but hold that the highest act of virtue is to abstain from injuring sentient creatures. Man does not possess an immortal spirit: death is the same to Brahman and to a fly. Therefore there is no heaven or hell separate from present pleasure or pain. Hindu Epiceneans! ‘Épicure de grande poudre.’

4 Jogi, or Yogi, properly applies to followers of the Yagya and Panchata school, who by ascetic practices acquire power over the elements. Vulgarity, it is a good term for carry about a Linga. The Svaras are Jain beggars, who regard their chiefs as superior to the gods of other sects. The Sannyasis are mendicant followers of Shiva; they never touch anything, and in religious mendicants, no man believed, and according to this creed the rule was carried on.”
third, queen fainted away with a severe pain in the head.

Having spoken thus much the Baital said, 'O my king! of these three which is the most delicate?'

The raja answered, 'She indeed is the most delicate who fainted in consequence of the headache.'

The Baital hearing this speech went and hung himself from the very same tree, and the raja having gone there and taken him down and fastened him in the bundle and placed him on his shoulder, carried him away.

THE VAMPIRE'S ELEVENTH STORY.

WHICH PUZZLES RAJA VIKRAM.

There is a queer time coming, O Raja Vikram!—a queer time coming (said the Vampire), a queer time coming. Elderly people like you talk abundantly about the good old days that were, and about the degeneracy of the days that are. I wonder what you would say if you could but look forward a few hundred years.

Brahmans shall disgrace themselves by becoming soldiers, and being killed, and Serviles (Shudras) shall dishonour themselves by wearing the thread of the twice-born, and by refusing to be slaves; in fact, society shall be all 'mouth and mixed castes.'

The courts of justice shall be disused; the great works of peace shall no longer be undertaken; wars shall last six weeks, and their countries shall be clean forgotten; the useful arts and great sciences shall die starved; there shall be no Gens of Science; there shall be a hospital for destitute kings, those, at least, who do not lose their heads, and no Vikramas.4

A severe shaking stayed for a moment the Vampire's tongue. He presently resumed. Briefly, building tanks; feeding Brahmans; lying when one ought to lie; sulking the sacred cow; and the burying of live children, shall become utterly unfashionable.

The consequence of this singular degeneracy, O mighty Vikram, will be that strangers shall dwell beneath the roof of Bhaba (Indus), and impure barbarians shall call the land their own. They shall be from a wonderful country, and I am most surprised that they bear it. The sky which ought to be gold and blue is there grey, a kind of dark white; the sun looks deadly pale, and the moon as if he were dead.5

The sea glistens when it is not dirty green with yellowish foam, and as you approach the shore, tall ghoastly cliffs, like the mountains of giants, rise above the line of the clouds, and it is obscured with what appears to be a shower of white feathers or flocks of cotton. At other seasons there is a pale glare produced by the mist clouds which spread themselves over the lower firmament, and even the faces of the people are white. The men are white when not painted blue, the women are white, and the children are whitest: these indeed often have white hair.

"Truly," exclaimed Dharma Dhwaj, "saws the proverb, "Waho seeth the world telleth a many a lie.""

At present (resumed the Vampire, not heeding the interruption), they run about naked in the woods, being merely Hindu outcasts. Pre-ently they will change—the wonderful white Parias! They will eat all food indifferently, domestic fowls, onions, dog fed in the street, donkeys, horses, laces, and (most horrible of all) the flesh of the sacred cow. They will drink what resembles colo-cynth, mixed with water, producing a curious frothy liquid, and a fiery stuff which burns the mouth, for their milk will be mostly chalk and pulp of brimstone; they will ignore the sweet juices of fruits and sugar-cane, and as for the pure element they will drink it, but only as medicine. They will shave their beards instead of their heads, and stand upright when they should sit down, and squat upon a wooden frame instead of a carpet, and appear in red and black like the children of Yam.6 They will never offer sacrifices to the manes of ancestor, and feminine duty in the preparation of daily food and in the superintendence of household utensils.

What said Rama of Sita his wife?

"If I chanced to be angry, she bore it without a murmur; in the hour of necessity she cherished me as a mother does her child; in the moments of reproach she was a lover to me; in times of gladness she was to me as a friend." And it is said, 'a religious wife assists her husband in his worship with a spirit as devout as his own. She gives her whole mind to make him happy; she is as faithful to him as a shadow to the body, and she esteems him whether poor or rich, good or bad, handsome or deformed. In his absence or his sickness she renounces every gratification; at his death she dies with him, and he enjoys heaven as the fruit of her virtuous deeds.'

Whereas if she be guilty of many wicked actions and he should die first, he must suffer much for the demerits of his wife.'

But these women will talk loud,

Pluto.
Vikram and the Vampire; or,

all other matters. The sage of Bharat Khandha guards the fraud sex strictly, knowing its frailty, and avoids tempting their noses or piquing their ears. They will, O my mother! converse with strange men and take their hands; they will receive presents from them, and, worst of all, they will show their white faces openly without the least sense of shame; they will ride publicly in chariots and mount horses, whose points they pride themselves upon knowing, and eat and drink in crowded places—trading husbands looking on the while and perhaps even leading them through the streets. And she will be deemed the pinnacle of the pagoda of perfection, that most excels in wit and shamelessness, and who can turn to water the livers of most men. They will dance and sing instead of minding their children, and when these grow up they will send them out of the house to shift for themselves, and care little if they never see them again. The greatest sin of all will be this: when widowed they will ever be on the look-out for a second husband, and instances will be known of women fearlessly marrying three, four, and five times. You would think that all this license satisfies them. But no! The more they have the more their weak minds covet. The men have admitted them to an equality, they will aim at an absolute superior and claim respect and homage; they will eternally raise tempta-pests about their rights, and if any one should venture to chastise them as they deserve, they would call him a coward and run off to the judge.

The men will, I say, be as wonderful about their women as about

1 Nothing astonishes Hindus so much as the apparent want of affection between the European parent and child.
2 A third marriage is held improper and baneful to a Hindoo woman. Hence, before the nuptials they broach the man to a tree, upon which the evil expends itself, and the tree dies.
3 Kazoo, Cupid.
4 An oath, meaning, 'From such a falsehood preserve me, Ganges!'
5 The Indian Neptune.
6 A highly insulting form of adjuration.
7 The British Isles, according to Wilford.
8 Literally the science (veda) of the bow (dhanush). This weapon, as everything amongst the Hindus, had a divine origin; it was of three kinds, the common bow, the pellet or steel bow, the crossbow or catapult.

1868] Tales of Indian Deity.

a shop near the mouth of mother Ganges, and they will sell lead and bullion, fine and coarse woollen clothes, and all the materials for information. Then they will begin to send for soldiers beyond the seas, and to enlist warriors in Zambu-dwipa (India). They will from shopkeepers become soldiers: they will beat and be beaten; they will win and lose; but the power of their star and the enchantments of their Queen Kompasi, a daina or witch who can draw the blood out of a man and slay him with a look, will turn everything to their good. Presently the noise of their armies shall be as the roaring of the sea; the dazzling of their arms shall blind the eyes like lighting; their battle-fields shall be as the dissolution of the world; and the slaughter-ground shall resemble a garden of plantain trees after a storm. At length they shall spread like the march of a host of ants over the land. They will swear 'Dehar Ganga!' that they hate nothing so much as being compelled to destroy an army, to take and loot a city, or to add a rich slip of territory to their rule. And yet they will go on killing and capturing and adding region to region, till the abode of snow (Himalaya) confines them to the north, the Sindhu-haddi (Indus) to the west, and elsewhere the sea. Even in this, too, they will demean themselves as lords and masters, scarcely allowing poor Samudraveta 2 to rule his own waves.

Raja Vikram was in a silent mood, otherwise he would not have allowed such ill-omened discourse to pass uninterrupted. Then the Baila, who in vain had often pased to give the royal carrier a chance of asking him a curious question, continued his recital in a dissatisfied tone of voice.

By my feet and your head, O warrior king! it will fair badly in those days for the rajahs of Hindustan, when the red-coated men of Shaks' shall come amongst them.

Listen to my story, for I will tell you the tale of the mother of the Sindhu-haddi, the ruler of the Indus, the most fertile and picturesque of the streams.

In the Vindhya Mountain there will be a city named Dharmapur, whose king will be called Mahabul.
He will be a mighty warrior, well skilled in the dhanu-veda (art of war), and will always lead his own armies to the field. He will duly regard all the omens, such as a storm at the beginning of the march, an earthquake, the implements of war dropping from the hands of the soldiers, screams tlying vultures passing over or walking near the army, the clouds and the sun's rays waxing red, thunder in a clear sky, the moon appearing small as a star, the dropping of blood from the clouds, the falling of lightning bolts, darkness filling the four quarters of the heavens, a corpse or a pan of water being carried to the right of the army, the sight of a female beggar with dishevelled hair, dressed in red and preceding the vanguard, the starting of the fish over the left ribs of the commander-in-chief; and the weeping or turning back of the horses when urged forward.

He will encourage his men to carve single combats, and will carefully train them to gymnastics. Many of the wrestlers and boxers will be so strong that they will often beat all the extremities of the antagonist into his body, or break his back, or

Vol. LXXXV.—No. COXXLXVII.

3 F
Vikram and the Vampire; or,

The white Pariahs have done their usual work. They have cut off the hands of some, the feet and heads of others, whilst several are stranded in shapeless masses, or scattered in pieces over the ground. The field is strewn with corpses, the river runs red, so that the dogs and jackals swim in blood; the birds of prey sit on the branches, drink blood from the stream, and enjoy the sickening smell of burnt flesh.

Such will be the scenes acted in the fair land of Bharat...

Perchance, two white outcasts, father and son, who with a party of men are scouring the forest and slaying everything, fall upon the path which the women have taken shortly before. Their attention is attracted by footprints leading towards a place full of tigers, leopards, bears, wolves, and wild dogs. And they are utterly confounded when, after inspection, they discover the sex of the wanderers.

How is it, shall the father, that the footprints which we see are seen in this part of the forest?

The son shall reply, 'Sir, those are the marks of women's feet: a man's foot would not be so small.'

'If it is passing strange,' shall join the elder white Pariah, 'but thou speakest truth. Certainly such a soft and delicate foot cannot belong to any one but a woman.'

'They have only just left the track,' shall continue the son, 'and look! this is the step of a married woman. See how she trod on the inside of her sole, because of the bending of her ankles. And the younger white outcast shall point to the queen's footprints.

Come, let us search the forest for them,' shall cry the father, 'what an opportunity of finding wives fortune has thrown in our hands. But no! thou art in error,' he shall continue, after examining the track pointed out by his son, 'I am supposing this to be the track of a matron. Look at the other, it is much longer; the toes have scarcely touched the ground, whereas the marks of the heels are deep. Of a truth this must be the married woman.' And the elder white outcaste shall point to the footprints of the process.

'Then,' shall reply the son, who admires the shorter foot, 'let us first seek them, and when we find them give to me her who has the short feet, and take the other to wife thyself.'

Having made this agreement they shall proceed on their way, and presently they shall find the women lying on the earth, half dead with fatigue and fear. Their legs and feet are scratched and torn by brambles, their ornaments have fallen off, and their garments are in strips. The two white outcasts find little difficulty, the first surprise over, in persuading the unhappy women to follow them home, and with great delight, conformably to their arrangement, each takes up his prize on his horse and rides back to the tents. The son takes the queen, and the father, the princess.

In due time two marriages come to pass: the father, according to agreement, espouses the long foot, and the son takes to wife the short foot. And after the usual interval, the elder white outcaste who had married the daughter rejoices at the birth of a boy, and the younger white outcaste who had married the mother is gladdened by the sight of a girl.

Now then, by my feet and your head, O warrior king Vikram, answer me one question. What relationship will there be between the children of the two white Pariahs?

Vikram's brow waxed black as a charred-burner's, when he again heated the most irreverent oath ever professed to mortal king. The question presently attracted his attention, and he turned over the Baital's words in his head, confusing the ties of filiality, brotherhood, and relationship and connection in general.

'Hem!' said the warrior king, at last perplexed, and remembering, in his perplexity, that he had better hold his tongue—'ahem.'

'Is your majesty speaking to the Vampire in an inquisitive and insinuating tone of voice.'

'Hem!' ejaculated the monarch.

The Baital held his peace for a few minutes, coughing once or twice impatiently. He suspected that the extraordinary nature of this last tale, combined with the use of the future tense, had given rise to a taciturnity so unexpected in the warrior king. He therefore asked if Vikram the Brave would not like to hear another little anecdote.

'This time the king did not even say 'hem.' Having walked at an unusually rapid pace, he distinguished at a distance the fire kindled by the devotee, and he hurried towards it with an effort which left him no breath wherewith to speak, even had he been so inclined.

'Since your majesty is so completely dumbfounded by it, perhaps this acute young prince may be able to answer my question.' insinuated the Baital, after a few minutes of anxious suspense.

But Dharma Dhwaaj answered not a syllable.

Conclusion.

At Raja Vikram's silence the Baital was greatly surprised, and he praised the royal courage and resolution to the skies. Still he did not give up the contest at once.

'Allow me, great king,' intoned the Demon, in a dry tone of voice, 'to wish you joy. After so many failures you have at length succeeded in repressing your loquacity. I will not stop to inquire whether it was humility and self-restraint which prevented you from answering my last question, or whether it was mere ignorance and inability. Of course I suspect the latter, but to say the truth your condescension in at last taking a Vampire's advice, flatters me so much, that I will not look too narrowly into cause or motive.'

Raja Vikram winced, but maintained a stubborn silence, squeezing his lips lest they should open involuntarily.

'Now, however, your majesty has mortified, we will suppose, a somewhat exacting vanity, I also will in my turn return the pleasure which I had anticipated in seeing you a corpse and in entering your royal body for a short time, just to know how queer it must feel to be a king. And what is more, I will now perform my original promise, and thou shalt derive from me a benefit which none but myself can bestow. First, however, allow me to ask you, will you let me have a little more air?'

Dharma Dhwaaj pulled the king's sleeve, but this time Raja Vikram required no reminder: wild horses or the executioner's saw, beginning at the shoulder, would not have drawn a word from him now. Observing his obstinate silence, the Baital, with an ominous smile, continued:

'Now give ear, O warrior king, to what I am about to tell thee, and bear in mind the giant's saying, 'A man is justified in killing one who has designed to kill him.' The young merchant Mal Dev, who placed such magnificent presents at your royal feet, and Shanta Shil the devotee-saint, who works his spells, incantations, and magical rites in a cemetery on the banks of the Godaveri river, are, as thou knowest, one person,—the terrible Jogi, whose wrath thy father aroused in his folly, and whose revenge thy blood alone can satisfy. A regard to thyself, the emperor's son, the same Jogi, fearing lest I might interfere with his projects of universal dominion, slew me by the power of his penance and has kept me suspended, a trap for you, head downwards from the siris tree.

'That Jogi it was, you now know, who sent you to fetch me back to him on your back. And when you cast me at his feet he will return thanks to you and praise your valour, perseverance and resolution to the skies. I warn you to beware. He will lead you to the shrine of Durga, and when he has finished his adoration he will do you, "O great king, salute my deity with the eight-limbed reverence!"'

Here the Vampire whispered for a time and in a low tone, lest some listening goblin might carry his words if spoken out loud to the ears of the devotee Shanta Shil. At the end of the monologue a rustling sound was heard. It proceeded from the Baital, who was disengaging himself from the dead body in the bundle, and the bundle became sensibly lighter upon the monarch's back.

The departing Baital, however, did not forget to bid farewell to the warrior king and his son. He complimented the former for the last time, in his own way, upon the royal humility and the prodigious self-mortification which he had displayed—qualities, he remarked, which never failed to ensure the proprietor's success in all the world.

Raja Vikram stepped out joyfully, and soon reached the burning-ground. There he found the Jogi, dressed in his usual habit, a deer-skin thrown over his back, and twisted reeds instead of a garment hanging round his loins. The hair had fallen from his limbs and his skin was bleached a ghastly white by exposure to the elements. A fire seemed to proceed from his mouth, and the matted locks dropping from his head to the ground were changed to the colour of gold or saffron by the rays of the sun. He had the beard of a goat and the ornaments of a king; his shoulders were high and his arms long, reaching to his knees; his nails grew to such a length as to curl round the ends of his fingers, and his feet resembled those of a tiger. He was drumming upon a skull, and incessantly exclaiming, 'Ho, Kali! ho, Devi! ho, Devi!' As before, strange beings were holding their carnival in the Jogi's presence. Monstrous asuras, giant goibins, stood grimly gazing upon the scene with fixed eyes and motionless features. Rakshasas and messengers of Yama, fierce and hideous, assumed at pleasure the shapes of foul and ferocious beasts. Nagas and Bhutas, partly human and partly bestial, dispotted themselves in throngs upon the upper airs, and were dimly seen in the faint light of the dawn. Mighty daityas, brahma-daityas, and pretas, the size of a man's thumb, or dried up like leaves, and peacocks of terracotta power guarded the place. There were enormous goats, vivified by the spirits of those who had slain Brahmans; things with the bodies of men and the faces of horses, camels, and monkeys; hideous worms containing the souls of those priests who had drunk spirituous liquors; men with one leg and one ear, and mischievous blood-sucking demons, who in life had stolen church property. There were women that had violated the beds of their spiritual fathers, restless ghosts that had loved low-caste women, shades for whom funeral rites had not been performed, and who could not cross the dread Yaitarani stream, and vital souls fresh from the horrors of Tamisur, or utter darkness, and the Usipatra Vana, or the sword-leaved forest. Pale spirits, Alayas, Gunas, Baitais, and Yakshas, beings of a base and vulgar order, glided over the ground, amongst corpuses and skeletons animated by female fiends, Dakinis, Yoginis, Hakinis, and Shankinis, which were dancing in frightful revelry. The air was filled with supernatural sights and sounds, cries of owls and jackals, cats and crows, dogs, asses, and vultures, high above which rose the clashing of the bones with which the Jogi sat drumming upon the skull before him, and tending a huge cauldron of oil whose smoke was blue fire. But as he raised his long lank arm, silver-white with ashes, the demons fled, and a momentary silence succeeded to their uproar. The tigers ceased to roar and the elephants to scream; the bears raised their snouts from their foul banquet, and the wolves dropped from their jaws the remnants of human flesh. And as they disappeared, the hoorning of the owl, the ghastly 'ha'! ha!' of the earwig, and the howling of the jackal died away in the far distance, leaving a silence still more oppressive.

As Raja Vikram entered the burning-ground, the hollow sounds of solitude alone met his ear. Sadly wafted the sweet autumnal blast. The tall ganet trees groaned alround, and bowed and trembled like slaves bending before their masters. Huge purple clouds and patches and lines of glaring white mist coursed furiously across the black expanse of firmament, discharging threads and chains and lozenges and balls of white and blue, purple and pink lightning, followed by the deafening crash and roll of thunder, the dreadful roaring of the mighty wind, and the torrents of pelting rain. At times was heard in the distance the dull gurgling of the swollen river, interrupted by explosions, as slips of earth-bank fell headlong into the stream. But once more the Jogi raised his arm and all was still: nature lay breathless, as if awaiting the effect of his tremendous spells. The warrior king drew near the terrible man, unstrung his bundle from his back, untwisted the portion which he had held, threw open the cloth, and exposed to Shanta Shil's glittering eyes the corpse, which had now recovered its proper form—that of a young child. Seeing it, the devotee was highly pleased, and thanked Vikram the Brave, extolling his courage and daring above any monarch that had yet lived. After which he repeated certain charms facing towards the south, awakened the dead body, and placed it in a sitting position. He then in its presence sacrificed to his deity the White 1 all that he had ready by his side—betel leaf and flowers, sandal wood and unbroken rice, fruits, perfumes, and the flesh of man untouched by steel. Lastly, he half filled his skull with burning embers, blew upon them till they shot forth tongues of crimson light, serving as a lamp, and motioning the raja and his son to follow him, led the way to a little fanz of the Destroying Deity, erected in a dark clump of wood, outside and close to the burning-ground. They passed through the quadrangular outer court of the temple, whose piazza was hung with deep shade. 2 In silence they circumambulated the small central shrine, and whenever Shanta Shil directed, Raja Vikram entered the sasha, or vestibule, and strick three times upon the gong, which gave forth a loud and warning sound.

1868] Tales of Indian Devilry.

They then passed over thethreshold, and looked into the gloomy inner depths. There stood Smashana-Kali, 3 the goddess, in her most horrid form. She was a naked and very black woman, with half-severed head, partly cut and partly painted, resting on her shoulder; and her tongue lolled out from her wide yawning mouth; 4 her eyes were red like those of a drunkard; and her eyebrows were of the same colour; her thick coarse hair hung like a mantle to her heels. 5 She was robed in an elephant's hide, dried and withered, confined at the waist with a belt composed of the hands of the giants whom she had slain in war: two dead bodies formed her earrings, and her necklace was of bleached skulls. Her four arms supported a scimitar, a noose, a trident, and a ponderous mace. She stood with one leg on the breast of her husband, Shiva, and she rested the other on his thigh. Before the idol lay the utensils of worship, namely, dishes for the offerings, lamps, jugs, incense, copper cups, conchs and gongs; and all of them smelt of blood.

As Raja Vikram and his son stood gazing upon the hideous spectacle, the devotees stooped down to place his skull-lamp upon the ground, and drew from off his ochre-coloured cloth a sharp sword which he hid behind his back.

'Prosperity to thine and thy son's

---

1 Shiva is always painted white, no one knows why. His wife Gauri also has a European complexion. Hence it is generally said that the sect popularly called 'Tales,' who were worshippers of these murderous gods, spared Englishmen, the latter being supposed to have some rapport with their deities.

2 The Hindu shrine is mostly a small building, with two inner compartments, the vestibule and the Garbaghari, or adytum, in which stands the image.

3 Meant Kali of the cemetery (Smashana); another form of Durga.

4 Not being able to find victims, this pleasant deity, to satisfy her thirst for the curious juice, cut her own throat, that the blood might spout up into her mouth. She once found herself dancing on her husband, and was so shocked that in surprise she put out her tongue to a great length, and remained motionless. She is often represented in this form.

5 From Yaksha, to eat; as Rakshasas are from Raksha, to preserve. See Hardy's Manual of Buddhism, p. 57.
for ever and ever, O mighty Vikram!' exclaimed Shanta Shil, after he had muttered a prayer before the image. 'Verily thou hast right royally redeemed thy pledge, and by the virtue of thy presence all my wishes shall presently be accomplished. Behold! the Sun is about to drive his car over the eastern hills, and our task now ends. Do thou reverence before this my deity, worshipping the earth through thy nose, and so prostrating thyself that thy eight limbs may touch the ground. Thus shall thy glory and splendour be great; the Eight Powers and the Nine Treasures shall be thine, and prosperity shall ever remain under thy roof-tree.'

Raja Vikram, hearing these words, recalled suddenly to mind all that the Vampire had whispered to him. He brought his joined hands open up to his forehead, caused his two thumbs to touch his brow several times, and replied with the greatest humility,

'O pious person! I am a king ignorant of the way to do such obeisance. Thou art a spiritual preceptor: be pleased to teach me and I will do even as thou desirest.'

Then the Jogi, being a cunning man, fell into his own net. As he bent him down to salute the goddess, Vikram drawing his sword struck him upon the neck so violent a blow, that his head rolled from his body upon the ground. At the same moment Dharma Dwaj, seizing his father's arm, pulled him out of the way in time to escape being crushed by the image, which with the sound of thunder fell upon the floor of the temple.

A small thin voice in the upper-air was heard to cry, 'A man is justified in killing one who has the desire to kill him.' Then glad shouts of triumph and victory were heard in all directions. They proceeded from the celestial choristers, the heavenly dancers, the mistresses of the gods, and the nymphs of Indra's Paradise, who left their beds of gold and precious stones, their seats glorious as the meridian sun, their canals of crystal water, their perfumed groves, and their gardens where the wind ever blows in softest breezes, to applaud the valour and good fortune of the warrior king.

At last the brilliant god, Indra himself, with the thousand eyes, rising from the shade of the Parigat tree, the fragrance of whose flowers fills the heavens, appeared in his car drawn by yellow steeds and cleaving the thick vapours which surround the earth—whilst his attendants sounded the heavenly drums and raised a shower of blossoms and perfume—bade the king Vikramajit the Brave ask a boon.

The raja joined his hands and respectfully replied, 'O mighty ruler of the lower firmament, let this my history become famous throughout the world!'

'It is well,' rejoined the god; 'as long as the sun and moon endure, and the sky looks down upon the ground, so long shall this thy adventure be remembered over all the earth. Meanwhile rule thou mankind.'

Thus saying Indra retired to the delicious Anrawati. Vikram took up the corpses and threw them into the cauldron which Shanta Shil had been tending. At once two heroes started into life, and Vikram said to them, 'When I call you, come!' With these mysterious words the king, followed by his son, returned to the palace un molested. As the Vampire had predicted, everything was prosperous to him, and he presently obtained the remarkable titles, Sakaro, or foe of the Sakas, and Sakadhipati-Vikramaditya, shortly called Vikram.

1 In other words, to the present day, whenever a Hindu novelist, romancer, or tale writer seeks a peg upon which to suspend the texture of his story, he invariably pitches upon the glorious, pious, and immortal memory of that Eastern King Arthur, Vikramaditya, shortly called Vikram.